

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. DAVISON CHEMICAL COMPANY of Baltimore County, Appt.,
v.
BAUGH CHEMICAL COMPANY of Baltimore County.

Contract — sufficient effort to perform.

1. One who has contracted to sell a specified number of tons of acid to be manufactured from pyrites, which he intended to import under carriage contracts with carriers, makes sufficient effort to secure the pyrites, in case of the breaking out of war, to relieve himself from liability under a war clause of his contract, if he repeatedly attempts to induce the carriers to comply with their contracts and unsuccessfully endeavors to purchase domestic pyrites, although he does not institute legal proceedings to compel the carriers to perform their contracts.

— construction — rules.

2. Contracts must receive a reasonable construction so as to give effect to the intention of the parties thereto, and so as to carry out, rather than defeat, the purpose for which they were executed.

— sale — construction.

3. A purchase by a manufacturer of acid phosphate of a specified quantity of chamber acid for a period of years refers to acid made from pyrites, where, to his knowledge, all but a small per cent of the acid produced for that purpose was made from pyrites, to which the seller's plant was alone adapted, while that produced from sulphur could not be produced for the sale price named.

Sale — manufacturer — duty to purchase from others.

4. One who contracts to furnish acid produced at his own plant is not bound, in case war interferes with his own production, to purchase acid from other manufacturers in order to make deliveries under his contract.

— increase in price of raw material.

5. One who has contracted to furnish a specified quantity of acid, to be manufactured from pyrites to be imported, is not relieved from his obligation by a sharp increase in the price of pyrites, owing to the breaking out of war.

Evidence — act of other manufacturers.

6. That other manufacturers have been able to secure some raw material is not conclusive evidence that one who has contracted to manufacture and furnish a specified quantity of acid during a year has not exercised reasonable diligence in attempting to secure raw material, after war broke out.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court, No. 2, of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiff, in a suit brought to compel specific performance of a contract to deliver certain acid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Venable, Baetjer, & Howard, for appellant:

Under the contingency clause in the contract, defendant was not obliged to manufacture and deliver to the plaintiff acid made from brimstone or pure sulphur, when it could no longer obtain a supply of pyrites.

R. 342, 9 Com. Cas. 200, 53 Week. Rep. 155.

The evidence shows that the defendant has used all means reasonably within its power to secure an adequate supply of pyrites, and failure of its supply was not due to its neglect or fault.

Messrs. Frank R. Savidge, W. Irvine Cross, and Lee S. Meyer for ap-pellee.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Baugh Chemical Company of Baltimore county, plaintiff below, is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of acid phosphate, and its plant is located in Baltimore county, Maryland, and the appellant, the Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore county, is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of sulphuric acid, and its plant is also located in Baltimore county. The chief materials used in the manufacture of acid phosphate, the product of plaintiff's plant, are sulphuric acid and phosphate rock, and for a number of years prior to the year 1913, the plaintiff had purchased the sulphuric acid required in the manufacture of its acid phosphate from the defendant. Sulphuric acid is made from sulphur, and originally, or in the early days, the raw material employed in the manufacture of that acid was native sulphur or brimstone. After the discovery of the sulphur-bearing ore called pyrites, containing about 50 per cent of sulphur, it became the raw material generally used in the manufacture of sulphuric acid, particularly the low grade of acid used in the making of acid phosphate. Just when this change from brimstone to pyrites took place is not definitely fixed by the evidence in the case, but the lower court, in its opinion, stated that it was between 1880 and 1890. The chief supply of pyrites was imported from Spain, the supply from the Canadian mines and mines in this country being very small, and those mines were generally owned or controlled, and their product consumed, by companies engaged in the manufacture of acid or acid phosphate.

In the early part of 1913, the plaintiff and defendant began negotiations for the purchase and sale of sulphuric acid, which resulted in a contract executed by them the 28th day of April, 1913, by which the plaintiff purchased from the defendant from 30,000 to 50,000 tons, of 2,000 pounds each, of sulphuric acid per year, of the quality designated "chamber acid, ranging from 50 degrees to 54 degrees Beaume," to be delivered at the plaintiff's works at Canton, or to Baugh & Sons Company, Norfolk, Virginia, for a period of five years, beginning January 1, 1913, and ending December 31, 1917, for the sum of $5.75 per ton. The contract provided that the plaintiff should declare on the 2d of January of each year what amount in excess of the minimum amount of 30,000 tons it would take that year, and that the deliveries of sulphuric acid should be made as nearly as possible in equal weekly instalments, and also contained the following provisions: "Fire, accident, or strike, in the work of any of the parties herein mentioned; obstruction to navigation, accident to acid barges, war, insurrections, or other uncontrollable causes rendering buyers unable to receive or sellers unable to deliver, shall be good and sufficient reasons to make this contract inoperative during the period of necessary repairs, reconstructions, or continuance of the difficulties."

Immediately following the execution of the contract, the price fixed thereby was, by agreement, reduced to $5 per ton. In pursuance of the provisions of the contract, the plaintiff elected to take 50 tons of acid per year, and it appears that the deliveries of the acid were accordingly and regularly made by the defendant during the years 1913 and 1914, and until some time early in the year 1915. During the year 1915, the defendant failed to make full deliveries to the plaintiff, and in February, 1916, the plaintiff filed a bill in equity to compel the defendant to perform its contract. The defense in that suit was that by reason of a breakdown in its plant, and other causes, the defendant had not been able to make full deliveries to the plaintiff and other parties, to whom it had sold sulphuric acid, and that it was therefore compelled to make a proportionate distribution of the product of its factory among them. In disposing of the case on May 18, 1916, Judge Bond said that the evidence produced showed that there had been much interruption in the defendant's factory, due to accidents and breakdowns in its plant during the year 1915, "and up to this time," which cut down its capacity to an "extraordinary extent," that as the defendant's contracts would have necessitated a full normal working of its plant, it was incapable, by reason of such interruption, of filling all of them; that the principle of "prorating" should govern and determine the rights of the parties when the output is involuntarily reduced was in that case conceded; that the suspected improper preference of later buyers over the plaintiff had not been established by the evidence, and that he would sign an order dismissing the petition for a preliminary injunction. The case was never pressed to a final hearing, and the bill was later dismissed by the plaintiff, and on the 10th of November, 1916, the plaintiff brought suit at law against the defendant to recover damages for the nondelivery of acid in accordance with its contract up to and including June, 1916.

Interference with the importation of pyrites caused by the war, which had diminished the normal supply during the year 1915, had largely abated during the fall of 1916 and the early part of 1917, and by reason thereof, and the extra efforts made by the defendant in anticipation of difficulty in obtaining the ore, it had, in March, 1917, accumulated at its plant about 48,000 tons. About that time, however, just preceding the entrance of this country into the war, the interference with navigation, occasioned by the German U-boat campaign, became very serious. The companies with which the defendant had contracted for delivery of the ore, and whose contracts contained a clause similar to the clause in the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, which we have quoted, notified the defendant that they would be compelled to suspend deliveries. After receiving this notice, and after making efforts to secure further deliveries of ore from the parties with whom it had contracted and from other sources, the defendant notified the plaintiff and all others with whom it had contracts for delivery of sulphuric acid that, after the exhaustion of its accumulated stock of pyrites, it would not be able to make deliveries of the acid contracted for, and would have to take advantage of the clause in its contract with the plaintiff, authorizing a suspension of deliveries. At the same time the defendant stated that it would continue its efforts to secure pyrites, and continue to deliver to them their proportion of acid from any pyrites that it might be able to obtain, and offered to install in its plant brimstone burners, and to furnish the plaintiff and other parties to whom it had contracted to furnish acid, with brimstone acid, provided they would agree to pay the increased cost of the brimstone acid, delivered in lieu of acid made from pyrites. All of the parties with whom the defendant contracted accepted the offer of the defendant and entered into agreements accordingly, except the plaintiff, and on the 25th of September, 1917, the plaintiff filed in the court below a bill of complaint against the defendant, in which it prayed:

"(a) That a decree may be passed commanding the said Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore county to specifically perform, keep, and observe the several promises and agreement in the aforementioned contract set out to be performed, kept and observed, and commanding and directing the said defendant corporation, its officers, agents and servants, to make, during the time covered by said contract, the deliveries of acid to this plaintiff required by said contract.

"(b) That an injunction may issue, strictly enjoining and prohibiting the said Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore county, its and each of its officers, agents, and servants, from delivering, during the terms covered by its said contract with the plaintiff, any sulphuric acid to any parties with which it has entered into contracts on or subsequent to May 7, 1915, while said Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore county is in default as to the delivery of any part of the sulphuric acid to which this plaintiff is entitled under said contract.

"(c) And that a preliminary injunction may issue, strictly enjoining and prohibiting the said Davison Chemical Company of Baltimore county, its and each of its officers, agents, and servants, from discriminating against the plaintiff in the distribution and delivery among its customers of the sulphuric acid manufactured by it from whatever raw material, and from withholding from this plaintiff any part of the fair and accurate pro rata share of the sulphuric acid manufactured by it until the further order of this court."

On the same day the court passed an order, directing a preliminary injunction to be issued, requiring the defendant to "proceed forthwith to fulfil the contract between the complainant and the defendant, dated the 28th day of April, 1913, in accordance with its terms," and providing that "the deliveries be at the rate of 50,000 tons a year, and that said deliveries be made weekly from this date, said deliveries to be made as nearly as possible in equal weekly instalments of 961 tons each. Provided, however, that if, in each and any week commencing from the date of this order, the defendant is unable to produce the entire output which it is normally capable of producing, or if for any justifiable cause the defendant is compelled to prorate its weekly output among its customers, then the defendant may abate the number of tons furnished to the complainant in each week, in the same proportion that the deliveries in such week to defendant's other customers are abated." The order further required the defendant to "continue to make such deliveries until such contract is fulfilled, or until the further order" of the court.

The defendant answered the plaintiff's bill, and moved that the preliminary injunction be dissolved; and the testimony in this case was taken at the hearing of that motion. Upon the evidence produced at the hearing, and on the 3d day of December, 1917, the court overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, and, in accordance with the application of the plaintiff, modified its order of September 25, 1917, granting the injunction, to the extent of limiting the deliveries of sulphuric acid by the defendant to December 31, 1917, or the further order of the court. Nothing further appears to have been done in the case until it was submitted for final decree upon bill, answer, and evidence taken at the hearing of the motion to dissolve, and, the parties having agreed that after the issuing of the preliminary injunction on the 25th of September, 1917, and until December 31, 1917, the defendant delivered to the plaintiff sulphuric acid at the rate of 50,000 tons per annum, the court passed the following decree, from which this appeal was taken: "It is, therefore, this 12th day of March, 1918, by the circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city, adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the defendant, under its contract with plaintiff and the evidence adduced, was obliged to specifically perform and carry out said contract with plaintiff from the date of the filing of the bill on, and to deliver to plaintiff between, September 25 and December 31, 1917, both inclusive, sulphuric acid at the rate of 50,000 tons a year, and as nearly as possible in equal weekly instalments of 961 tons each, irrespective of the raw material from which the said acid might be made, and that the injunction heretofore granted in this case on the 25th day of September, 1917, as modified by the order issued on the 3d day of December, 1917, be and it hereby is made perpetual."

The defense relied on by the appellant is, that under its contract with the plaintiff of April 28, 1913, it was not required to deliver acid made from brimstone, and that as it was unable, by reason of the war, to obtain the necessary amount of pyrites to fulfil its contract with the plaintiff and other parties with whom it had contracted to deliver acid or acid phosphate, it was entitled, under the provision we have quoted, to suspend the deliveries of acid to the plaintiff to the extent of its inability to secure pyrites. The contention of the appellee is that the appellant was bound to deliver the acid to the amount specified in its contract, regardless of whether it was made from brimstone or pyrites, and, further, that the appellant, by a proper effort, could have obtained a sufficient amount of pyrites to enable it to comply with its contract. The learned court below took the view that by reason of the conflict in the testimony as to the meaning of the words, "chamber acid," the evidence produced by the defendant was not sufficient to establish a usage, and to show that the trade meaning of the words, "chamber acid," was acid produced from pyrites, and further held that the evidence showed that the defendant had not exercised due diligence to secure sufficient pyrites to enable it to fulfil its contract with the plaintiff, and that it had not made an effort to procure acid from other manufacturers of acid for that purpose. The effect of the preliminary injunction was to require the defendant, during the period between the 25th of September and the 31st of December, to supply the plaintiff with sulphuric acid made from brimstone or pyrites, at the rate of 50,000 tons a year, without regard to its ability to procure pyrites.

The pleadings, exhibits, and testimony in the case cover about 800 pages of the printed record. It would necessarily greatly prolong this opinion to undertake to discuss this evidence, and we shall not attempt to do more than state the conclusion we have reached after careful examination of it.

It is apparent that the first and important question in the case involves the construction of the contract between the plaintiff and defendant of April 28, 1913. A large part of the evidence was offered for the purpose of showing the meaning of the words, "chamber acid." The witnesses produced by the plaintiff testified that they mean acid manufactured by the chamber process from either pyrites or brimstone, while the evidence offered by the defendant tends to show that, at the time the contract of 1913 was executed, they were generally understood by those engaged in the manufacture or sale of acid and acid phosphate, to mean the low grade of acid manufactured from pyrites by the chamber process. The precise question, however, to be determined, is, What is the meaning of the words, "chamber acid," as used in the contract between the plaintiff and defendant? In the case of W. B. Saunders Co. v. Ducker, 116 Md. 474, 82 Atl. 154, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 817, this court said: "It is an established canon of construction that, 'in order to arrive at the intention of the parties, the contract itself must be read in the light of the circumstances under which it was entered into. General or indefinite terms employed in the contract may be thus explained or restricted as to their meaning and application; and the contract must be so construed as to give it such effect, and none other, as the parties intended at the time it was made.'"

Contracts "must receive a reasonable construction so as to give effect to the intention of the parties thereto, and so as to carry out rather than defeat the purposes for which they were executed. They should neither, on the one hand, be so narrowly or technically interpreted as to frustrate their obvious design; nor, on the other hand, so loosely or inartificially as to relieve the obligor from a liability fairly within the scope or spirit of their terms [116 Md. 479]." And in the case of Schlens v. Poe, 128 Md. 352, 97 Atl. 649, the court said: "It is, therefore, the duty of the court to construe them [resolutions], to ascertain the intention of the parties; and that intention must be gathered from the language of the resolutions, read in the light of the circumstances existing at the time. The rule of construction, as stated in Nash v. Towne, 5 Wall. 699, 18 L. ed. 527, is this: 'Courts, in the construction of contracts, look to the language employed, the subject-matter, and the surrounding circumstances. They are never shut out from the same light which the parties enjoyed when the contract was executed, and, in that view, they are entitled to place themselves in the same situation as the parties who made the contract, so as to view the circumstances as they viewed them, and so as to judge of the meaning of the words and the correct application of the language to the things described.'"

The evidence in the case shows that, in 1913, the defendant had been furnishing the plaintiff the acid used in the manufacture of its acid phosphate for a great many years; that, with one or two minor exceptions, sulphuric acid of the quality used in the manufacture of acid phosphate, and sold for that purpose, was made from pyrites ore, which contains about 50 per cent of sulphur, by the process known as the chamber process, and that only about 5 per cent of the brimstone or sulphur sold in this country was used for acid making, and that that per cent of brimstone employed in making acid was used in the production of what was known as a high grade acid or brimstone acid, which was used for purposes other than the manufacture of acid phosphate. Dr. Grosvenor, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, testified that in 1913 the amount of brimstone or sulphur used in the manufacture of sulphuric acid was only about 5 per cent of the raw material used for that purpose. The evidence further shows that the cost of the brimstone or sulphur, in 1913, was about $22.50 per ton, while the cost of pyrites, containing an equal amount of sulphur, was about $11 a ton, and that the cost of the brimstone required to make 1 ton of acid was $5.15, while the cost of the pyrites necessary to make 1 ton of acid was $2.60 a ton. The undisputed evidence also shows that the officers of the plaintiff were at the time considering the advisability of manufacturing the sulphuric acid necessary for its own plant, and knew what it would cost to produce it, and that they were familiar with the construction of the defendant's plant, and knew that it was, at that time, only adapted to the production of sulphuric acid from pyrites. In view of this evidence it is impossible to escape the conclusion that, when the plaintiff and defendant used the words, "chamber acid," to describe the subject-matter of their contract, they did not refer to acid made ~~—sale—con-~~

from brimstone, ~~struction.~~ which they both knew the defendant could not produce in its plant as then constructed, and could not furnish at the contract price of $5 per ton. Whether, therefore, strictly and technically speaking, chamber acid may be said to include acid made by the chamber process from either pyrites or brimstone, if we are to give effect to the well-established canon of construction to which we have referred, arriving at the intention of the parties, it would seem reasonably clear that the contract referred to the kind of sulphuric acid that was almost universally employed in the manufacture of acid phosphate, and to the production of which the defendant's plant was adapted, and which alone the defendant could have furnished at the price agreed upon.

It would be giving the contract a strained and unreasonable construction to assume that the defendant obligated itself to deliver 50 tons of brimstone acid per year, through a period of five years and commencing at a date anterior to the date of the contract, when it knew, and the plaintiff knew, it could not do so except at a loss per ton equal to about one half of the price agreed upon.

In regard to the second proposition, the evidence shows that in 1913 the capacity of the defendant's plant was about 170 tons of sulphuric acid per year; that about the time it executed the contract with the plaintiff the defendant entered into a contract with the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company, by which the latter company agreed to furnish the defendant, "as near as possible in equal monthly quantities, delivered alongside vessels at Curtis bay, Baltimore, Maryland, their entire requirements of sulphur as pyrites, for use in their works at and near Baltimore, estimated as eighty thousand (80,000) tons of twenty-two hundred and forty (2,240) pounds, for the calendar years of nineteen hundred and fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen (1915, 16, 17, and 18); said ore to be Spanish smalls or fines from the Rio Tinto Company's mines, to be shipped from port in Huelva, Spain, and to average from forty-six (46) to forty-eight (48) per cent of sulphur;" that the 80,000 tons of pyrites per year to be delivered by the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company would have been sufficient to produce 180,000 tons of sulphuric acid per year, and that that company had been supplying the defendant with its entire requirements for many years prior to 1913, and had never in the past failed to do so; that the defendant also entered into a contract with Naylor, Benzon, & Company, Limited, of London, for 140,000 tons of pyrites ore, to be delivered during the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, a contract with the Pyrites Company, Limited, of London, for 20,000 tons of pyrites, to be delivered during the years 1915 and 1916, and a further contract with the Pyrites Company, Limited, for 25,000 tons of pyrites, to be delivered during the year 1917; that the total importation of pyrites was about 1,300,000 tons per year, and that of that supply the three companies mentioned imported about 1,000,000 tons per year. It further appears from the evidence that after the defendant received notice from these companies in the spring of 1917 that, owing to the U-boat campaign and their inability to secure the necessary tonnage, they would have to suspend the deliveries of pyrites ore under their contracts, the president and officers of the defendant made repeated and weekly visits to New York to see the representatives of the companies mentioned, to induce them to make deliveries, and that they also investigated the possibility of obtaining Canadian and domestic pyrites, and found that it was impossible to secure any ore from that source; that they went to see the representatives of other importers of pyrites ore, and were unable to obtain from them any deliveries; that to induce the representatives of the importers mentioned, and other importers of pyrites, to make deliveries, they agreed to pay any additional freight charges that might be necessary to secure the requisite tonnage; and that the only pyrites they were able to obtain between April 20th and the time of the institution of the present suit consisted of two cargoes, one cargo from the Pyrites company, which was delivered in June, 1917, and one cargo from Naylor, etc., company, delivered in July, 1917, both of which cargoes were used by the defendant in the manufacture of acid, and the acid was distributed among the parties with whom it had contracts, including the plaintiff.

The evidence produced by the defendant tends to show that a number of other manufacturers of sulphuric acid or acid phosphate were able to secure pyrites, but it also appears that many of them were comparatively small manufacturers, and that in a number of instances they owned or controlled the domestic or Canadian mines from which they obtained the ore; and all of the evidence tends to show that there was great scarcity of pyrites during the time in which the plaintiff was unable to secure deliveries other than the two cargoes mentioned.

The learned court below in its opinion referred to the fact that it did not appear that the defendant had instituted legal proceedings to compel the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company to comply with its contract, or that it had attempted to purchase sulphuric acid from other manufacturers with which to meet its obligation to the plaintiff.

under consideration contained a clause like the clause in the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, the circuit court of appeals approved the following instructions of the court below: "Now, where a party enters into a contract providing for the delivery of certain articles of merchandise, he is obliged to use diligence to supply himself with sufficient quantities to carry out the terms of his contracts, if he can do that in the exercise of due diligence. . . . So that the questions for you to consider under all the evidence are whether you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant did use the diligence which I have stated, that is, the diligence which a reasonably prudent man, in good faith desiring to carry out the terms of his contract, would exercise, in obtaining supplies necessary to proceed with the manufacture and delivery of the prussiate of potash."

In the case of Simpson Bros. v. John R. White & Son (C. C.) 187 Fed. 418, the court said, in reference to a clause of a similar nature in a building contract: "In interpreting a clause of this character in a construction contract like that before us, due regard must be had to circumstances, and to the ordinary course of business in contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract;" and that a contractor, in such a case, is required to show that he had exercised ordinary diligence to secure the materials.

In the case of Jessup & M. Paper Co. v. Piper (C. C.) 133 Fed. 108, the court, dealing with a contract containing a clause excusing performance where the fulfilment of it was prevented by strikes or by hindrances beyond the control of the parties, said of the defendant: "It is bound to carry out its contracts even with that clause in, so far as, at all events, to put forth all reasonable and proper exertion to overcome whatever hindrances may be offered to the carrying out of its contracts. . . . If . . . they could have obtained the cars for delivery to the plaintiffs, by arrangement with the railroad company, they were bound to make it. They were bound, in other words, to do whatever was reasonable and proper to overcome whatever hindrance existed with regard to this car supply; and, if they failed to do whatever was reasonable and proper, whether it be the expenditure of labor and exertion, or the reasonable expenditure of money, then they have failed in the discharge of their duty, and to that extent they would be liable to respond to the plaintiff in damages. But if there was a scarcity of cars, a shortage of cars, and it was beyond their power,—explaining, as I have, what their duty in that respect was,—if it was beyond their power to remove that hindrance, if they gave the plaintiff its ratable share of cars during the period in question, then they certainly have discharged all their duty with reference to that part of the claim that they could be called upon to discharge."

In the case of Mineral Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289, L.R.A. 1916F, 1, 156 Pac. 458, the supreme court of California said: "The parties were contracting for the right to take earth and gravel, to be used in the construction of the bridge. When they stipulated that all of the earth and gravel needed for this purpose should be taken from plaintiff's land, they contemplated and assumed that the land contained the requisite quantity available for use. The defendants were not binding themselves to take what was not there. And, in determining whether the earth and gravel were available, we must view the conditions in a practical and reasonable way. Although there was gravel on the land, it was so situated that the defendants could not take it by ordinary means, nor except at a prohibitive cost. To all fair intents, then, it was impossible for defendants to take it. 'A thing is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable; and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive and unreasonable cost.' 1 Beach, Contr. § 216. We do not mean to intimate that the defendants could excuse themselves by showing the existence of conditions which would make the performance of their obligation more expensive than they had anticipated, or which would entail a loss upon them. But where the difference in cost is so great as here, and has the effect, as found, of making performance impracticable, the situation is not different from that of a total absence of earth and gravel."

Applying the principles stated in the cases referred to, to the facts of this case, we think the evidence shows that the defendant did exercise all reasonable diligence in its efforts to secure the pyrites necessary to enable it to comply with its obligation to the plaintiff.

to perform.

The contract of the defendant was to deliver to the plaintiff the product of its plant, and the defendant was not required to purchase acid from other manufacturers in order to make deliveries to the plaintiff. It was bound to make every reasonable effort to secure the pyrites, and to pay any reasonable sum necessary to enable it to do so. The fact that the price of pyrites ore was greatly in excess of the amount that it had contracted to pay for it did not relieve the defendant of its duty to perform its contract. The evidence tending to show that other manufacturers of acid or acid phosphate had been able to secure some pyrites is not conclusive evidence that the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have obtained sufficient quantities of the ore to meet its obligations, or sufficient to overcome the positive evidence adduced by the defendant to show that it made every effort to obtain the ore.

The case of Wilson & Co. v. Tenants, [1917] 1 K. B. 208, referred to by the court below, was reversed on appeal by the House of Lords, and in the opinions of the majority of the justices it was held that the evidence showed that the defendant was, within the meaning of the contract under consideration, prevented or hindered, because the cutting off of the German supply during the war left the defendant unable to secure enough of the articles to fill all of its contracts and supply its ordinary business. It follows from what we have said that the preliminary injunction should have been dissolved, and we must, therefore, reverse the decree from which this appeal was taken.

Decree reversed with costs, and bill dismissed.

NOTE.

The question involved in the reported case (DAVISON CHEMICAL Co. v. BAUGH CHEMICAL Co. ante, 1), whether one who has undertaken to supply goods to another is protected by a provision in the contract, suspending or excusing performance in certain contingencies, where war conditions have cut short his supply of raw material, is dealt with in the annotation, post, 21, and more particularly in subdivision III. b, 2, thereof.

DAVISON CHEMICAL Co. v. BAUGH CHEMICAL Co. is of special interest by reason of its holding that the seller was entitled to the protection of the war clause, even though the willingness of its other customers to make new contracts left it in a position where it might have performed its contract with the plaintiff in full, had it not distributed among all its customers, pro rata, the acid made from such pyrites as it was able to obtain.

T. W. ALLEN & SONS, Limited.

([1918] 2 K. B. 467.)

Contract — sale of goods — impossibility of performance due to outbreak of war — discharge.

Where a purchaser of Finland birch timber to be delivered f.o.b. at a British port, under a contract made before the outbreak of war, was unaware that no stocks of Finland timber were held in England, and that the invariable practice was to ship Finland timber direct from Finnish ports, no condition can be implied that the contract was made subject to the seller's ability to obtain shipments of timber; and the sellers are liable in damages although their failure to deliver the timber in accordance with their bargain was due to the war.

APPEAL from a decision of McCardie, J., reported [1918] 1 K. B. 540, 118 L. T. N. S. 222, 34 Times L. R. 266, by whom the facts were summarized as follows:

"The claim is for damages for breach of contract. The plaintiffs are manufacturers of bobbins for spinning. Their office is at Blackburn. The defendants are timber merchants at Hull. In the early part of 1914 the defendants sold to the plaintiffs seventy standards of Finland birch timber at the price of £10, 15s. per standard free on rail at Hull. Deliveries were to commence about June or July, 1914, and to continue during the season which would expire about November in that year. The contracts were not formal; they were created by correspondence. They contained no war or force majeure or suspension provisions. They were simple bargains of sale and purchase. Finland produces birch timber of a clean and pliable character. It is particularly useful for the purpose (inter alia) of manufacturing bobbins. The contract required that the timber to be supplied to the plaintiffs should come from Finland. Prior to the war the unvarying practice was to load the timber into vessels at ports in Finland for direct sea carriage to English ports. No timber was railed across Scandinavia for ship-

"Up to August, 1914, the defendants had made no deliveries to the plaintiffs. Then war broke out. Imports of timber from Finland stopped at once. German war vessels traversed the Baltic. Transport was paralyzed. No vessels left Finland for Sweden. Swedish vessels ceased to sail for Finland. The vast disorganizing effect of the war on trade and transport need not be further indicated. It undoubtedly effected a revolution of circumstance, and rendered it impossible for the defendants to deliver the timber in accordance with their bargain. The English timber merchants who deal in Finnish timber do not hold stocks. Their timber as it arrived before the outbreak of war had gone to the customers to whom it had been already sold.

"Following upon the outbreak of war the defendants did not supply the plaintiffs with any portion of the timber to which the plaintiffs were entitled during the season of 1914. Correspondence took place between the parties up to November, 1914. Thenceforward no letter or communication passed between them until July, 1916. In that month the plaintiffs asked for delivery. The defendants then asserted for the first time that the contracts had been dissolved by the outbreak of war in 1914. The plaintiffs disputed this assertion; hence their claim to damages. The defense contains no plea that the contract was mutually abandoned, nor was any such point raised in argument."

McCardie, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, holding (1) that the contract had not been dissolved, and that the defendants were liable in damages for the nondelivery of the timber; and (2) that the contract was not one for the supply of materials "for any building or work" within § 1, subsec. 1, of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1917.

The defendants appealed from the decision on the first point.

MacKinnon, K. C. and Jowitt for the defendants.

C. Atkinson, K. C., and du Parc, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

[As the court held on the facts that the decisions relied upon by the defendants were inapplicable, and therefore that it was unnecessary to discuss them, the argument is not set out.]

Pickford, L.J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decision of McCardie, J., and the point raised is whether an implication is to be read into the contract the performance of which has been interfered with or prevented by matters arising out of the war. The contract, which contained no exceptions, was for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiffs of 70 standards of Finland birch timber at the price of £10 15s. per standard free on rail at Hull. Before the war it was the regular practice to load the timber on vessels at ports in Finland for direct sea carriage to English ports, and not to send it by rail across Scandinavia and ship it from a Scandinavian port to England. When war broke out the Germans declared timber to be contraband, but, even before that declaration, sailings from Finnish ports had entirely ceased, and therefore the ordinary and normal method of supplying Finland timber came to an end. I will assume that it was not possible, at first at any rate, to get Finland birch timber to England at all, although it is true that in 1916 a certain amount was sent across Scandinavia and shipped from ports there. In August, 1914, and the following months, some correspondence took place between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to the timber, the former asking for supplies, and the defendants taking up the position that all pre-war contracts had been canceled by the war.

The defendants contend that the contract was at an end because it was in the contemplation of both parties that the defendants should be able to supply the timber according to the ordinary method of supplying it in trade, and that when that became impossible both parties were discharged from their obligations. We have had a most interesting discussion of the numerous cases where this doctrine has been dealt with, and it is from no disrespect to Mr. MacKinnon's argument that I refrain from going through them, but I refrain from doing so because I accept the principle for which those cases were cited. The principle was thus stated by Lord Haldane in Tamplin S. S. Co. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co. [1916] 2 A. C. 397, 406: "The occurrence itself," i. e., the occurrence preventing the performance of the contract, "may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation." It was also stated thus by Lord Shaw in Horlock v. Beal [1916] 1 A. C. 486, 512, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 602, 114 L. T. N. S. 193, 32 Times L. R. 251, 60 Sol. Jo. 236, 21 Com. Cas. 201: "The underlying ratio is the failure of something which was at the basis of the contract in the mind and intention of the contracting parties." In my opinion McCardie, J., was right in saying that the principle of these cases did not apply to discharge the defendants in this case. He has found that the plaintiffs were unaware at the time of the contract of the circumstance that the timber from Finland was shipped direct from a Finnish port to Hull, and that they did not know whether the transport was or was not partly by rail across Scandinavia, nor did they know that timber merchants in this country did not hold stocks of Finnish birch. I accept the finding that in fact the method of despatching this timber was not known to the plaintiffs. But there remains the question, Must they be deemed to have contracted on the basis of the continuance of that method although

they did not in fact know of it? I see no reason for saying so. Why should a purchaser of goods, not specific goods, be deemed to concern himself with the way in which the seller is going to fulfil his contract by providing the goods he has agreed to sell? The sellers in this case agreed to deliver the timber free on rail at Hull, and it was no concern of the buyers as to how the sellers intended to get the timber there. I can see no reason for saying,—and to free the defendants from liability this would have to be said,—that the continuance of the normal mode of shipping the timber from Finland was a matter which both parties contemplated as necessary for the fulfilment of the contract. To dissolve the contract the matter relied on must be something which both parties had in their minds when they entered into the contract, such, for instance, as the existence of the music hall in Taylor v. Caldwell (1863) 3 Best & S. 826, 122 Eng. Reprint, 309, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 164, 8 L. T. N. S. 356, 11

Week. Rep. 726, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 603, or the continuance of the vessel in readiness to perform the contract, as in Jackson v. Union Marine Ins. Co. (1873) L. R. 8 C. P. 572, (1874) L. R. 10 C. P. 125, 44 L. J. C. P. N. S. 27, 31 L. T. N. S. 789, 23 Week. Rep. 169, 2 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 435, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 650. Here there is nothing to show that the plaintiffs contemplated, and there is no reason why they should be deemed to have contemplated, that the sellers should continue to have the ordinary facilities for despatching the timber from Finland. As I have said, that was a matter which to the plaintiffs was wholly immaterial. It was not a matter forming the basis of the contract they entered into.

On the facts the nearest case to this is Ashmore v. Cox [1899] 1 Q. B. 436, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 72, 15 Times L. R. 55, 4 Com. Cas. 48. There shipment was to be made by sailer or sailers from a port or ports in the Philippine Islands between May 1 and July 31, 1898. The Spanish-American War prevented the shipment by sailer between the dates mentioned. Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., held that no implied condition was to be imported that it was possible to ship by sailer between those dates. I think that case was rightly decided, and this is an a fortiori case.

For the reasons I have given the defendants have failed on the facts to make out their case that the contract was dissolved. The appeal will be dismissed.

Bankes, L.J.: I agree. I rest my decision upon the facts of this particular case. No doubt the defendants when they entered into this contract intended to perform it by shipment in the ordinary way, that is, direct from some Finnish port to a port in England, but so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, they knew nothing as to how the timber was brought to this country, whether brought wholly by sea or partly by land and partly by sea. In those circumstances, whether one applies the test laid down by Lord Haldane in the Tamplin Case [1916] 2 A. C. 397, 406, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1389, 115 L. T. N. S. 315, 32 Times L. R. 677, or that laid down by Lord Shaw in Horlock v. Beal [1916] 1 A. C. 486, 512, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 602, 114 L. T. N. S. 193, 32 Times L. R. 251, 60 Sol. Jo. 236, 21 Com. Cas. 201, or whether it is said that performance became impossible, as that expression is found in the judgment of Hannen, J., in Baily v. De Crespigny (1869) L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, 38 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 98, 19 L. T. N. S. 681, 17 Week. Rep. 494, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 799, or whether the matter is treated as one to which the principle of an implied condition as explained by Lindley, L.J., in Turner v. Goldsmith [1891] 1 Q. B. 544, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 247, 64 L. T. N. S. 301, 39 Week. Rep. 547, applies,—whichever of these is the correct method,—or whether all these tests are applied, the result is the same, because the facts are not such as to bring the defendants within the principle of any of the cases relied upon on their behalf. In my view the judgment of McCardie, J., was right.

Warrington, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I also think that this case is to be decided on its own facts. In order to succeed the defendants must prove, to use the words of Lord Shaw in Horlock v. Beal [1916] 1 A. C. 486, 512, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 602, 114 L. T. N. S. 193, 32 Times L. R. 251, 60 Sol. Jo. 236, 21 Com. Cas. 201, a "failure of something which was at the basis of the contract in the mind and intention of the contracting parties." In the present case, what is alleged to have failed is the normal mode of transport of the subject-matter of the contract from Finland to this country. It was not proved that the continuance of that normal mode of transport was at the basis of the contract in the mind and intention of the contracting parties. The contract was merely for the sale and delivery of a certain quantity of Finland birch squares free on rail at Hull. The judge has found as a fact, and I see no reason for upsetting that finding, that the plaintiffs were unaware, at the time of the contract, of the circumstance that the timber from Finland was shipped direct from a Finnish port to Hull. They did not know whether the transport was or was not partly by rail across Scandinavia, nor did they know that timber merchants in this country did not hold stocks of Finnish birch. It seems to me, therefore, that the normal mode of transport was not in fact in the mind and intention of the plaintiffs, and I see no reason for holding that that normal mode must be deemed to have been in their mind and intention. I do not deal in detail with the argument of Mr. MacKinnon or with the elaborate review of the cases by McCardie, J., because in the view I take it is unnecessary to do so. For the reason I have given I agree that the judgment of McCardie, J., should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

The reported case (BLACKBURN BOBBIN Co. v. T. W. ALLEN & SONS, ante, 11) is of interest as holding that the fact that a seller's contemplated source of supply is shut off by an interruption of the usual modes of transportation by war will not excuse delay or failure to perform, unless he can show that the obtaining of a supply from such sources was an implied condition of his obligation; and that no such condition can be implied where the purchaser was unaware of the necessity of obtaining goods from abroad.

Shipping — frustrated adventure — war embargo — retention of freight.

1. The Federal government's repeated refusal, conformably to its decision to refuse clearances to sailing vessels destined to proceed through the war zone, to permit a second departure of such a vessel which had been compelled by a storm to return to port for safety and repair, frustrated the adventure, relieving the carrier from further obligation to carry the cargo, and justifying it in refusing to refund the prepaid freight, where the bill of lading incorporated by reference all the conditions and exceptions of the charter party, and the latter instrument contains, inter alia, the provisions, "freight to be prepaid net on signing bills of lading . . ." "freight earned, retained, and irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost," since the government embargo must be regarded as being so far permanent as naturally and justifiably to determine business judgment and action depending upon it, and the contract regarded a sailing ship only, not some other kind of ship or means.

2. Provisions in a bill of lading issued by the owners of a sailing vessel bound for the war zone that the carrier shall not be liable for loss, damage, delay, or default "by causes beyond the carrier's reasonable control; . . . by arrest or restraint of governments, princes, rulers, or peoples; . . . by prolongation of the voyage," justify the shipowner in regarding the adventure as frustrated, so as to relieve it from further obligation to carry the cargo, and in refusing to refund the prepaid freight, where, after the vessel had been compelled by a storm to return to port for safety and repairs, the Federal government repeatedly refused to permit a second departure, it having decided while the vessel was at sea to refuse clearances thereafter to sailing vessels bound for the war zone. 3 A.L.R.—2.

Mr. John C. Prizer, for libellants:

If, for any reason whatsoever, other than the fault of the shipper, the cargo fails to arrive at destination in merchantable condition, no freight is earned.

Asfar v. Blundell [1896] 1 Q. B. 123, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 138, 73 L. T. N. S. 648, 44 Week. Rep. 130, 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 106; The Harriman, 9 Wall. 161, 19 L. ed. 629; The Kimball (Duncan v. Where the voyage is interrupted by any cause, even by a peril excepted in the contract, the vessel has the privilege of forwarding the cargo by another vessel in order to earn its freight; but unless it does so forward the cargo to destination, no freight is payable.

A contract of affreightment may and frequently does provide that freight shall be prepaid upon shipment. In such a case, if the arrival of the cargo at destination is thereafter prevented by some cause excepted in the charter party (as by a peril of the sea), the American and English law differ upon the right of the vessel to retain the freight. The American and Continental law requires the freight to be returned to the shipper, since it has not in fact been earned.

Under the English rule, the amount of the prepaid freight can be recovered as an item of damage, if the vessel has failed to perform the voyage in consequence of a cause against which it has not provided in its contract.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions in the cases arise upon libels filed against the Allanwilde to recover prepaid freight for the transportation of certain goods and merchandise to designated ports in Europe.

The solution of the questions turns upon (1) the asserted prevention of the adventure by a storm at sea which the vessel encountered, requiring her return to port for repairs, and (2) afterwards by the restraining power of the government.

On November 1, 1917, the Allanwilde, owned by the Allanwilde Transport Corporation, was seized upon libels filed by the Vacuum Oil Company and A. W. Pidwell, respectively, each of which had shipped certain goods to be carried from New York to Rochefort, France.

In May, 1917, the Oil Company chartered the vessel to carry a cargo of oil in barrels at the rate of $16.50 a barrel (changed afterwards to $15.25).

The charter party contained, inter alia, the following provisions:

" . . . freight to be prepaid net on signing bills of lading in United States gold or equivalent, free of discount, commission, or insurance. Freight earned, retained, and irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost."

On August 25, the oil having been loaded, the vessel issued a bill of lading containing, inter alia, the following provision: "All conditions and exceptions of charter party are to be considered as embodied in this bill of lading."

Pidwell was permitted to ship certain kegs of nails on the vessel, and on August 15 a bill of lading was issued to him. Inter alia, it provided that the carrier should not be liable for loss, damage, delay, or default "by causes beyond the carrier's reasonable control; . . . by arrest or restraint of governments, princes, rulers, or peoples; . . . by prolongation of the voyage; . . ."

It is provided in ¶ 5 of the bill of lading that "full freight to destination, whether intended to be prepaid or collected at destination, and all advance charges . . . are due and payable to (the Allanwilde Transport Corporation) upon the receipt of the goods by the latter . . . and any payment made . . . in respect of the goods . . . shall be deemed fully earned and due and payable to the carrier at any stage before or after loading of the service hereunder without deduction (if unpaid), or refund in whole or in part (if paid), goods or vessel lost or not lost, or if the voyage be broken up; . . ."

In pursuance of the contracts thus attested the oil and the nails were shipped on the Allanwilde, and the freight was paid in advance,—$49,745.50 for the oil and $3,128 for the nails.

The vessel was seaworthy and properly manned and equipped, and set sail September 11. After she had been out about fourteen days and was about 500 miles from New York, she encountered a storm so severe that her boats were carried away and she sprang a leak so threatening that the water in her hold was 3 or 4 feet deep and was gaining on the pumps. Thereupon the master properly decided that he must seek a port of refuge for safety and repair. Halifax was about 500 miles away, but in that direction the wind was against him, while it was favorable for New York, and on this account, as well as for other good reasons, he headed for New York, where he arrived on October 5, having been out twenty-four days. Repairs were undertaken at once, the cargo remaining on board meanwhile.

"On September 28, while the vessel was at sea, the government decided to refuse clearance thereafter to any sailing vessel bound for the war zone. The master did not know of this condition until the vessel returned to New York; he received no information from the shore after September 11. The repairs being finished, the vessel attempted to resume her voyage, but clearance was refused and none could be obtained in spite of her efforts to induce the government to modify its stand. Toward the end of October the shippers were notified by the carrier to unload their goods, and this they did, but under protest and reserving their rights. Afterwards the oil was forwarded by steamship, but at a higher rate of freight and under other charges. What became of the nails after they were unloaded does not appear.

"The vessel declined to refund the freight to either shipper, and the libels were filed to recover not only the prepaid freight but also damages for failure to carry. On each libel the district court entered a decree for the prepaid freight alone, refusing recovery for the other damages."

Upon these facts the circuit court of appeals have certified four questions, two in each libel, as follows:

"1. Was the adventure frustrated, and was the contract evidenced by the charter party and by the bill of lading issued to the oil company dissolved, so as to relieve the carrier from further obligation to carry the oil?

"2. Whatever answer may be given to the first question, did the contract thus evidenced justify the carrier under the facts stated in refusing to refund the prepaid freight?

"3. Was the adventure frustrated, and was the contract evidenced by the bill of lading issued to Pidwell dissolved, so as to relieve the carrier from further obligation to carry the nails?

"4. Whatever answer may be given to the third question, did the contract thus evidenced justify the carrier under the facts stated in refusing to refund the prepaid freight?"

A copy of the charter party and copies of the bills of lading are attached to the certificate and also the official bulletin refusing clearance to "sailing vessels destined to proceed through the war zone."

The argument of counsel upon the elements of the questions is quite extensive, ranging through all of the ways in which contracts can be dissolved or their performance excused by the agreement of the parties or prevented by some supervening cause independent of the parties and dominating their convention. We do not think it is necessary to follow the argument through that range. It may be brought to the narrower compass of the charter party and the bills of lading.

The physical events and what they determined are certified. First, there was the storm, compelling the return of the ship to New York to avert greater disaster; then the action of the government precluding a second departure. Does the contract of the parties provide for such situation and take care of it, and assign its consequences? The charter party provides, as we have seen, that "freight to be prepaid net on signing bills of lading. . . . Freight earned, retained, and irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost." And it is provided that this provision is, with other provisions, "to be embodied" in the bill of lading. They seem necessarily, therefore, deliberately adopted to be the measure of the rights and obligations of shipper and carrier. Let us repeat: the explicit declaration is—"Freight to be prepaid net on signing bills of lading. . . . Freight earned, retained, and irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost." The provision was not idle or accidental. It is easy to make a charge of injustice against it if we consider only the defeat of the voyage and the noncarriage of the cargo. But there are opposing considerations. There were expected hazards and contingencies in the adventure and we must presume that the contract was framed in foresight of both and in provision for both. We cannot step in with another and different accommodation. It is urged, however, that there is no provision in the contract (charter party and bill of lading) of the oil company excepting "restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples," and that, therefore, the carrier was not relieved from its obligation by the refusal of clearance to sailing vessels. And it is further urged that such embargo was at most but a temporary impediment, and the cargo should have been retained until the impediment was removed, or transported in a vessel not subject to it. We cannot concur in either contention. The duration was of indefinite extent. Necessarily, the embargo would be continued as long as the cause of its imposition,—that is, the submarine menace,—and that, as far as then could be inferred, would be the duration of the war, of which there could be no estimate or reliable speculation. The condition was, therefore, so far permanent as naturally and justifiably to determine business judgment and action depending upon it. The Kronprinzessin Cecilie (North German Lloyd v. Guaranty Trust Co.) 244 U. S. 12, 61 L. ed. 960, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490.

There is no imputation of bad faith. The carrier demonstrated an appreciation of its obligations and undertook their discharge. It was stopped, first by storm, and then prevented by the interdiction of the government. In neither situation was it inactive. It quickly repaired the effects of the former and protested against the latter, joining with the shipper in an earnest effort for its relaxation. It gave up only when the impediment was found to be insurmountable.

The answer to the other contention is that the contract regarded the Allanwilde, a sailing ship, not some other kind of ship or means. The Tornado (Ellis v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co.) 108 U. S. 342, 27 L. ed. 747, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 746; The Kronprinzessin Cecilie, supra.

The bill of lading in No. 450 is even more circumstantial. It provided that "full freight to destination, whether intended to be prepaid or collect at destination . . . shall be deemed fully earned and due and payable to the carrier at any stage before or after loading of the service hereunder, without deduction (if unpaid) or refund in whole or in part (if paid), goods or vessel lost or not lost, or if the voyage be broken up."

And there is exemption from liability "for any loss, damage, delay, or default . . . by arrest or restraint of government, princes, rulers, or peoples; . . ."

The questions certified are therefore answered in the affirmative.

So ordered.

Right of parties to contract, the performance of which is interfered with or prevented by war conditions or acts of government in prosecution of war.

I. Introduction.

The interest at present attaching to the subject of this annotation, which was prepared for use in connection with some important English decisions, reported in vol. 8 of British Ruling Cases, has prompted its inclusion in this series.

Its scope does not include the question of the effect of war on contracts

III. Effect of provision in contract suspending or excusing performance in certain contingencies:

- a. As excluding doctrine of commercial frustration, 41.
- b. As covering situation occasioned by war:
  1. In charter parties or bills of lading, 43.

of persons who, upon its outbreak, have become alien enemies.

As to the effect of war on c. i. f. contracts, see Arnhold, K. & Co. v. Blythe, G. J. & Co. 7 B. R. C. (Eng.) 934, and note thereto appended.

The number and importance of the legal questions to which the European War has given and is still likely to give rise appear to justify a collation of the cases from the point of view indicated by the title of this note, although their decision may have been based on general principles of broader operation.

It is familiar law that, as a general rule, what a party is bound by contract to perform, he must perform, or pay damages upon his failure to do so. To this rule, however, there have been admitted certain exceptions. The first is where the contract is one for personal services, in which case there is generally the implied condition that the person who is to render the service shall be alive, and not incapacitated by illness. The second exception is where the specific thing which is essential to performance is destroyed. The third exception is where the performance of the contract has become unlawful; and the fourth, which is difficult to state in general terms which are not too broad, is where the conditions with reference to which the parties must be deemed to have contracted do not in fact exist, or where, without fault of either party, there has been such a change in conditions that to enforce performance under the changed conditions is in effect to substitute a different contract. This fourth exception has been termed by the English courts, "the doctrine of commercial frustration."<sup>1</sup>

There are, in the class of cases described by the title of this note, two questions, considered respectively in subdivisions II. and III., infra, (a) whether the particular case falls within any of the above-stated exceptions; and (b) if it does not, whether the party sought to be charged has succeeded in contracting himself out of liability for nonperformance in the event which has occurred.

II. In general.

a. Where subject-matter of contract or means of performance has been requisitioned.

For discussion of the effect of the requisition of a chartered vessel upon the rights of the parties, see II. b, infra.

Where, after the making of the contract of sale, the subject of the sale has been requisitioned, the case may be regarded either as one in which the basis of the contract has been destroyed, or as one where performance has been rendered illegal by an act of state, and the seller is accordingly excused.<sup>2</sup> But where the requisition was not made until after the time for performance had expired, the buyer's right to damages for <sup>1</sup> "Commercial frustration of an adventure by delay means," said Bailhache, J., in Admiral Shipping Co. v. Weidner, H. & Co. [1916] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 429, "the happening of some unforeseen delay without the fault of either party to a contract, of such a character as that by it the fulfilment of the contract in the only way in which fulfilment is contemplated and practicable is so inordinately postponed that its fulfilment when the delay is over will not accomplish the only object or objects which both parties to the contract must have known that each of them had in view at the time they made the contract, and for the accomplishment of which object or objects the contract was made." And this definition is referred to with approval in Scottish Nav. Co. v. W. A. Souter & Co. [1917] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 222, 115 L. T. N. S. 812, 33 Times L. R. 71, 61 Sol. Jo. 85, 22 Com. Cas. 154.

The juristic meaning of the phrase,

"commercially impracticable," is that the contract cannot be applied to circumstances which could not have been within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. Per McCordie, J., in Naylor, B. & Co. v. Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft [1918] 118 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 442.

In the performance of contracts with the government, even for military supplies, precedence over civilian contracts does not necessarily inhere, nor may be imported or imposed otherwise than as provided by act of Congress.<sup>9</sup>

The effect of National Defense Act, § 120 (39 Stat. at L. 213, 214, chap. 134, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 3115F-3115H, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1343), which provides that, when an order is placed by the government, "compliance with all such orders for products or materials to be obligatory," and "shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such individual, firm, or corporation," and a similar provision of the Naval Appropriation Act of March 4, 1917, chap. 180, is to exonerate a manufacturer whose capacity has been engrossed by government requirements from liability for delay thereby occasioned in filling his other contracts, whether made before or after the enactment of such statutes; though such is not the case where he has voluntarily entered into a contract with the government.<sup>10</sup>

But a manufacturer cannot avail himself of the provisions of the National Defense Act as an excuse for failure to perform a civilian contract, where it does not appear that the government intended to exercise tract to carry freight on a line of steamers might have been excused had the government, in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, seized the vessels; but that, as it appeared that the vessels were voluntarily chartered to the government, performance was not excused.

As to the effect of an exception of "restraint of princes" to exonerate the owners or charterers from further performance of a charter party, see III. b, 1, post.

According to a series of English cases, a time charter party is terminated by the requisition of the vessel by the government when the requisition, to the mind of a reasonable man, would seem likely to outlast a charter party;<sup>12</sup> the time as of which such

<sup>12</sup> There is no such reasonable probability of the charterers being unable to regain possession of the chartered vessels for a period which will enable them to derive a substantial benefit therefrom, as to dissolve time charter parties, where at the date of the requisition the charter parties had respectively two, three, and four years to run, notwithstanding it appears that practically the whole of that class of vessels are under requisition so that there is very little chance of any of the ships in question being released during the war. Chinese Engineering & Min. Co. v. Sale & Co. [1917] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 599, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1465, 33 Times L. R. 464, 117 L. T. N. S. 32, 22 Com. Cas. 352.

A charter of a steamship for one month, with an option to the charterer of continuing the hire from month to month for an indefinite period, is not terminated by an Admiralty requisition, where there is no proof that the vessel is not likely to outlast the war; and it is immaterial that the requisition was made at the request of the charterers, or that during the period of requisition the vessel has been transferred from a gross basis to the net basis. Elliott Steam Tug Co. v. Charles Duncan & Sons [1918] 34 Times L. R. (Eng.) 583.

In F. A. Tamplin S. S. Co. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co. [1916] 2 A. C. (Eng.) 397, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1389, 115 L. T. N. S. 315, 32 Times L. R. 677, where a vessel chartered by a time charter party was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and at the time of the hearing the charter party still had over nineteen months to run, it was held that, as there was a possibility that the vessel might be available for commercial purposes before the expiration of the charter period, there was no such alteration of the basis of contract as to warrant the owner in treating the charter party as at an end.

In Heilgers & Co. v. Cambrian Steam Nav. Co. (1917) 33 Times L. R. (Eng.) 348, affirmed in (1917) 34 Times L. R. 72, where a steamer chartered under a time charter was requisitioned at a time when only about four and one-half months of the charter period were unexpired, it was held that as the evidence showed that no business man would, at the time of the requisition, have felt that there was any hope of his obtaining possession of the vessel before the expiration of the charter, for any period which would enable him to use her for any useful purpose, the charter party was determined by the requisition.

In Bank Line v. Arthur Capel & Co. [1919] A. C. (Eng.) 435, where a vessel, chartered for a period of twelve months from the time the vessel should be delivered and placed at the disposal of the charterers at a coal port in the United Kingdom, as ordered by the charterers, to trade between safe ports within specified limits, the charter party providing that should the steamer not have been delivered on April 30th, 1915, the charterers should have the opportunity of canceling the charter, and that should it be proved that the steamer, through unforeseen circumstances, could not be delivered by the canceling date, the charterers, if required, should, within a prescribed time after receiving notice thereof, declare whether they would cancel or take delivery, was requisitioned after the 30th of April, 1915, but before delivery, the requisition and detention so destroyed the identity of the chartered service as to entitle the owner to treat the charter party as at an end.

A court is justified in finding that a time charter party, having five months to run at the time of the requisition of the chartered vessel by the government, is terminated by such requisition, where there is evidence that when a ship was requisitioned by the government the average general expectation was that it would be detained for the period of the war, and test is to be applied being the time when the requisition is made.<sup>13</sup>

Whether a time charter party is determined by a requisition of the vessel by the government during its currency is a question of fact in every case, which has to be decided by the judge on the material before him.<sup>14</sup>

In the United States, it has been held that a time charter party is not necessarily terminated by a requisition of the vessel by the government, and the charterer is accordingly entitled to the compensation paid by the government so long as the ship is used for voyages within the charter limits and in carrying cargoes not of the character excluded by the charter party.<sup>15</sup>

The owners of a vessel under charter are justified in refusing to load a cargo as directed by the charterers, where the vessel has been requisitioned by their government, although it was at the time in foreign waters.<sup>16</sup>

In an English case, where a vessel chartered for twelve months at a certain sum, payable monthly, and containing an exception clause under which the restraint of princes was mutually excepted, and a clause giving the charterer an option of subletting, was requisitioned by the Admiralty, it was held that as the owner was exonerated from obligation to put the ship at the charterer's disposal during the period it was under requisition, and as there was not an entire failure of consideration if the charter party was subsisting, the charterer having become entitled to the hire payable by the Admiralty, the charterer was liable for the hire during the requisition period, although the amount paid by the government was substantially less than the charterer's hire.<sup>17</sup>

Apportionment of hire paid by government.

Time charterers of vessels requisitioned by the government are not entitled to the whole of the hire paid by at the date of the requisition there was no expectation that the war would come to an end in five months. Countess of Warwick S. S. Co. v. Le Nickel Société Anonyme [1918] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 372, 8 B. R. C. 546, 118 L. T. N. S. 196, 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. 309, 23 Com. Cas. 231.

The view taken by the English courts, that a time charter party is terminated by the requisition of the vessel by the government when the requisition, to the mind of a reasonable man, would seem likely to outlast the charter party, is commented upon by Judge Hand in Earn Line S. S. Co. v. Sutherland S. S. Co. (1918) 254 Fed. 126, who said, in part: "I should myself incline to think that any requisition ought, prima facie, to terminate the charter party. As I have said, I do not regard the conditions of the 'breakdown' clause as necessarily exclusive. It does not seem to me, with deference, a very practicable rule to speculate upon whether the charter party will outlast the requisition by any period at all. Suppose it does outlast it by a few months. The charterer may have been deprived of the use of the ship without adequate return for perhaps all but a short time. It seems unfair to hold him to the hire. I recognize the difficulties where the charter may have years to run; but when, as here, the question is of months, it seems to me that a requisition which is presumably intended for a substantial time should terminate the contract. This question it is not, however, necessary for me to decide."

The question was not raised in this case whether the adventure was determined by the Admiralty requisition, in as much as the Admiralty requisition proved to be for less than one half of the period of time chartered, and, owing to the rise in freights, it was to the charterer's advantage to treat the charter party as subsisting.

the government for their use where the use which the government may make of the vessels under its charter is more extensive than the use which the original charterers were entitled to make; but in such case the government charter takes effect partly out of the interests of the charterers and partly out of that of the owners, and the compensation paid by the government must be apportioned between the owners and charterers in a ratio to be fixed by ascertaining as fairly as possible what the owners could properly demand monthly for altering the charters to the Admiralty form, which sum should not only include what is necessary to indemnify the owners against the extra expense imposed upon them by the terms of the government charter, but also something to represent what they might reasonably have asked, if free to bargain, for consenting to alter the charter at all, and the sum which the charterers could properly demand monthly for the loss of the benefit of the charter, which must not include anything for special loss possibly inflicted upon the charterers by reason of dislocation of the trade for which they happened in fact to require the ships, but must be fixed on the basis of the value of the ships' services pursuant to the time charters in the tonnage market. The two sums forming the ratio must be calculated with reference to the values ruling on the day of the requisition, and on the footing that the requisition is to last for an indefinite time, but to expire substantially before the expiration of the time charters.<sup>18</sup>

Where, under the terms of a time charter, hire is to cease on the day of loss, the charterers of the vessel, which was lost by a war risk while under requisition by the government, have no right to share in the compensation money payable by the government.<sup>19</sup>

c. Where performance involves doing of illegal act.

It is, as above stated, a well-recognized exception to the general rule that what a party undertakes to do he is bound to perform, that where the performance of a contract becomes impossible by reason of the passage of a statute or by an act of state rendering performance illegal, both parties to the contract are discharged.<sup>20</sup>

This is the ground of decisions which hold that contracts involving continued intercourse are discharged by outbreak of war between the countries of the respective parties.<sup>21</sup> So, also, where a contract between citizens of the same country, or between a citizen and a neutral, cannot be performed without commercial intercourse with the public enemy, as in the case of some contracts for the sale of goods in the enemy's country,<sup>22</sup> or a charter party to carry to

The law upon this subject was doubtless made, according to the well-known rule, to meet cases of ordinary occurrence, and in times when to permit trading with the enemy, even through neutrals, was the exception, not the rule. These considerations may explain the origin of the rule authoritatively laid down in the books as to war at once working an absolute dissolution."

The foregoing decision was regarded as controlling in Wycombe Borough Electric Light & P. Co. v. Chipping Wycombe Corp. [1917] 33 Times L. R. (Eng.) 489, in which it was also held that a provision in an agreement for the lighting of streets that "in case of any default in lighting the lamps or any of them, or if some shall remain not lighted or be suffered to go out during the times in which the same ought to be lighted, as aforesaid, from any cause whatever," the municipal corporation shall be at liberty to deduct a certain sum in respect of each unlighted lamp from any payment to be made by them, does not entitle the municipality to a deduction in the case of lamps unlighted because of governmental restraints; since the words, "from any cause whatever," must, in view of the whole contract, be taken as intended to be limited in fact to any cause within the lighting company's control, and as intended only to provide for default or negligence by the company.

domestic embargo preventing performance may merely suspend, and does not necessarily terminate, a contract of affreightment,<sup>32</sup> unless continued for such a length of time that the object of the voyage is defeated.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>32</sup> An embargo, to continue until the further order of the council, preventing a shipment to a foreign port, was held in Hadley v. Clarke (1799) 8 T. R. 259, 101 Eng. Reprint, 1377, 4 Revised Rep. 641, merely to suspend, and not to dissolve, the contract of carriage; so that, although more than two years elapsed before the removal of the embargo, it was held that the shipper could recover damages for a failure thereafter to perform the contract. Regarding this decision, the court in Andrew Millar & Co. v. Taylor & Co. (Eng.) supra, said that it was there held that although the period of suspense was extreme,—between two and three years,—yet if the effect of an act of state is not to render the completion of the contract impossible, but only to delay its execution temporarily and for a reasonable period, and does not frustrate the object of the engagement from a business point of view and as a mercantile adventure, the promisor is not excused, but must perform the contract; that is to say, must perform it within a reasonable time after the difficulty has been removed.

The rule that an embargo, to continue for an indefinite time, preventing performance, suspends, but does not dissolve, a contract contemplating the shipment of goods, is supported also by the case of Baylies v. Fettyplace (1811) 7 Mass. 325. And in this case, it was regarded as immaterial whether the act of Congress laying the embargo was constitutional or otherwise, as it was an ordinance of the government over which the obligor had no control, and rendered performance of the contract temporarily impossible.

This doctrine that a domestic embargo preventing performance merely suspends, and does not terminate, a contract of affreightment, although the embargo is in terms unlimited as to time, and the concurrence of both the legislative and executive branches of the government is necessary to its removal, was approved also in Odlin v. Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania (1908) 2 Wash. C. C. 312, Fed. Cas. No. 10,433, where the question, in an action on an insurance policy, was whether an embargo, imposed by the government to which the insurer and insured belong, subsequently to the beginning of the risk, furnished a legal ground for abandonment. A similar case is M'Bride v. Marine Ins. Co. (1810) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 299.

In Touteng v. Hubbard (1802) 3 Bos. & P. 291, 127 Eng. Reprint, 161, 6 Revised Rep. 791, it was held that a British merchant who chartered a Swedish ship then in England, to transport a cargo of fruit from a certain port to England, was not liable for damages for nonperformance, where, because of an embargo laid by the British government on all Swedish vessels, the ship was detained in England until after the season for shipping fruit had passed. The court stated that, if this had not been a Swedish ship hired by a British merchant, the latter would have been obliged to furnish the ship with a cargo if she arrived at the port in question as soon as she might conveniently do so after the embargo was removed, although, by arriving after the fruit season was over, the object of the voyage might be defeated; also that an ordinary embargo does not put an end to the contract of affreightment, but is to be considered as a temporary suspension of the contract only, and that the parties must submit to whatever inconvenience may arise therefrom, unless they have provided against it by the contract. But the ground of the decision was stated to be that a British merchant is not liable to answer for any damages which the owner of a foreign vessel may sustain from an embargo laid by the British government on foreign ships in the nature of reprisals and partial hostility.

Thus a warranty to sail on or before a certain date in a policy of insurance on a ship is violated by a failure to depart until after such date, although the ship was prevented from sailing by an embargo.<sup>34</sup>

A contract of employment is subject to the implied term that it shall cease to be binding when future performance becomes unlawful; and therefore is finally determined, and not merely suspended, where the employee enlists in or is drafted into the Army.<sup>35</sup>

In a New Jersey case<sup>36</sup> it was held by the vice chancellor that contracts obtained as part of a scheme which, if successful, would have the effect of disrupting the organization of a plant engaged in the manufacture of war materials essential to the prosecution of the war, were avoidable so long as they remained executory, and this whether or not the parties intended to better themselves and had in mind no thought of injury to the government.

It has been held in an English case that further performance of a contract for a supply of print paper at a certain price is excused, whereby governmental restriction importers are forbidden to supply their customers more than two thirds of the weight supplied to them in 1914, such prohibition rendering the performance of the contract impossible because the delivery of two thirds is not a performance of the contract.<sup>37</sup>

This decision seems as erroneous in principle as it is unjust in fact. The rule that partial delivery is nonperformance is one intended to benefit the purchaser, and should not be perverted to his disadvantage. There was a full performance in this case (compare Leiston Gas Co. v. Leiston-cum-Sizewell Urban Dist. Council, in note, 31, supra) the obligation of the seller having been, by operation of law, reduced pro tanto. Why should the purchaser lose both the paper of which the government order deprived him and the benefit of his bargain?

Illegality of performance created by the law of a foreign state is not a defense to an action for nonperformance if the contract is not one governed by the law of such foreign state.<sup>38</sup>

Accordingly, a charterer is liable for freight though unable to load a cargo because of a prohibition upon exportation by the government of a foreign country from a part of which the cargo was to be carried.<sup>39</sup>

A refusal by the government of clearance to sailing vessels destined to proceed through the war zone, being likely to continue for the duration of the war, of which there could be no estimate or reliable speculation, is not a temporary impediment, and may warrant a carrier in treating his undertaking as abrogated, and not merely as suspended. *ALLANWILDE TRANSPORT CORP. v. The decision, however, was affirmed by the court of appeal, though not without an expression of doubt on the point, on the ground that the parties had contracted on the footing that there should continue to exist the right to import the materials which were necessary for the performance of the contract, and that when the import was prohibited, except upon the terms which obliged the seller to deal with the diminished quantity in a manner other than that prescribed by the contract, the circumstances were so altered that the parties were relieved from the further performance of the contract. *E. d. Change in conditions due to war as destroying basis of contract.

The doctrine developed in a series of cases of which Metropolitan Water Bd. v. Dick, K. & Co. [1918] A. C. (Eng.) 119, 8 B. R. C. 483, 87 L. J. K. B. N. S. 370, 23 Com. Cas. 148, 84 Times L. R. 113, 16 L. G. R. 1, 117 L. T. N. S. 766, [1917] W. N. 352, 82 J. P. 61, is a conspicuous example, is that where performance of a contract has been more than temporarily interrupted or wholly prevented by a change in the conditions with reference to which the parties must be deemed to have contracted, the obligation of the contract is dissolved. In applying this doctrine the courts disclaim any assumption of power to absolve the promisor on the ground that to require performance is inequitable, but assume merely to give effect to an implied term of the contract that the situation with reference to which it was made shall remain essentially unchanged.<sup>40</sup> The attractiveness of this doctrine lies in its appearance of even-handed justice. It is, however, open to grave objection as departing from the simple and certain rule that the parties' relative claims upon and duties in respect of each other are conclusively fixed and defined by the terms of their own written contract, and as substituting therefor an inquiry, necessarily speculative, into the mental reservations with which the parties made their bargain. To entertain such a doctrine is to substitute uncertainty for certainty, and to create rather than to avoid the necessity of litigation.<sup>41</sup>

It is not enough to bring this doctrine into operation that performance has become more difficult or dangerous<sup>42</sup> or unprofitable.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>40</sup> "Where parties have entered into a contract the performance of which is afterwards interrupted or prevented by circumstances not imposing legal liability for breach of contract on either party, the question, in the absence of any express provision in the contract, whether further performance is completely excused, the contract being at an end, or is suspended till the removal of the cause of interruption, or whether the interruption furnishes no excuse to the party prevented from performance, depends on the exact nature of the implied term, if any, in that particular contract, and whether, when the terms of that implication are settled, what has happened falls within those terms." Per Scrutton, L. J., in Metropolitan Water Bd. v. Dick, K. & Co. [1917] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 1.

If from the nature of the contract the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things will continue to exist, a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract. In applying this rule it is manifest that such a term can rarely be implied except where the discontinuance is such as to upset altogether the purpose of the contract. Some delay or some change is very common in all human affairs, and it cannot be supposed that any bargain has been made on the tacit condition that such a thing will not happen in any degree. Per Earl Loreburn, in F. A. Tamplin S. S. Co. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co. [1916] 2 A. C. (Eng.) at p. 403, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1389, 115 L. T. N. S. 315, 32 Times L. R. 677.

The European War of 1914-1919, cannot, notwithstanding its magnitude, be considered such an unexpected event that of itself, without considering its consequences, it dissolves a contract with the performance of which it has interfered. E. Hulton & Co. v. Chadwick & Taylor (1918) 34 Times L. R. (Eng.) 230, 62 Sol. Jo. 329.

<sup>41</sup> For a very vigorous criticism of this doctrine, with an instructive analysis of the decisions in which it has been evolved, see an article by Mr. E. C. Mayers, on "The Need of Law Reform—The Doctrine of Frustration of Adventure," in 38 Canadian Law Times, pages 86, 151, and 223.

Whether temporary interruption or impossibility to perform the contract will determine it depends upon whether such interruption or impossibility was one within the contemplation of the parties, or whether its extent is so great and so long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to proceed; or, to express it in another way, whether the interruption to performance goes to the root of the matter or the consideration, so that it would render the carrying out of the rest of the contract a thing different in substance from what the parties have stipulated for.<sup>44</sup>

The rights of the parties are to be determined not according to the event, but in view of the circumstances existing at the time the promisor refuses or becomes unable to proceed.<sup>45</sup>

States and Spain, and, on account of the danger of loss of its steamers through seizure by the naval forces of Spain, the defendants discontinued the operation of its line of ships. The court said it was only where hostilities exist between the country to which the vessel belongs and the country for which it is bound that the contract of affreightment is dissolved; and that even had international complications rendered transportation more hazardous, the contract would have been unimpaired, and the defendant would have been compelled to submit to the increased peril.

The owners of a vessel are bound to perform the voyage for which they have chartered the vessel, or to pay damages for their failure to do so, notwithstanding the voyage would expose the vessel to the risk of being sunk by a submarine, where it appears that commerce was not suspended because of the submarine warfare, but on the contrary vessels owned by citizens of both neutral and belligerent countries sailed continuously in the waters in which that warfare was being waged. Piaggio v. Somerville (1919) — Miss. —, 80 So. 342.

The existence of a state of war does not affect the running of interest on an ascertained balance of account owing to the citizen of a neutral country, if during such time remittance might have been made with safety. Crawford v. Willing (1803) 4 Dall. (U. S.) 286, 1 L. ed. 836.

Cas.* 48, it was held that the defendant, who agreed to sell to the plaintiff 250 bails of Manila hemp, shipment to be made from a port in the Philippine Islands "by sailer or sailers . . . between May 1 and July 31, 1898," had assumed the absolute responsibility of complying with the contract as to the date and method of shipment, and was not excused from nonperformance by the fact that shipment by sailer between the dates named became, in a mercantile sense, impossible because of the Spanish-American War; it appearing, however, that there was a shipment between the dates named which would have satisfied the contract had it been made for or obtained by the defendant. And it was held that a tender of hemp shipped on September 15th by steamship, although the vessel was expected to arrive about the time the hemp would arrive if shipped on a sailer between the dates named in the contract, was not such a tender as the contract required, so as to constitute a defense to an action for damages.

<sup>46</sup> Subsequent events must not be taken into consideration in determining whether a party was justified in refusing to proceed with the performance of his contract, the question being whether, in view of the circumstances existing at the time, the retake into account the real duration of the interruption as proved by the facts which have happened since the commencement of the action.<sup>46</sup>

The broad statement has been made that impossibility of performance due to a foreign war is no excuse,<sup>47</sup> but this is not unqualifiedly true. What is true is, that illegality of performance occasioned by the act of a for-ign state is no excuse where the contract is not governed by the laws of such state, and that a foreign war will not exonerate the promisor unless he can show that immunity from such interference was an implied condition of his undertaking.<sup>48</sup>

The fact that a seller's contemplated source of supply is shut off by an interruption of the usual modes of transportation by war,<sup>50</sup> or by a governmental restriction on exportation,<sup>51</sup> will not excuse delay or failure to perform unless he can show that the obtaining of a supply from such sources was an implied condition of his obligation, and that the interruption of such supply rather than the depletion of his stock by subsequent sales was the cause of his default.<sup>52</sup>

It has been held that a contract for the sale of a quantity of sugar to be delivered at a German port either on board a vessel or at a designated warehouse, at the purchaser's option, cannot be considered as subject to the implied condition that it shall be possible to export the sugar, though such contract was entered into by the parties in ignorance of the fact that the German government had placed an em-

The basis of a pre-war contract to carry cement by sea from the Thames to the Forth at a freight which was fixed at a low rate in view of the fact that cargoes of coal were available for the return trip is not destroyed because, in consequence of war, the ports from which the coal was usually carried have been closed, leading to a congestion and consequent delay at the ports where coal could be loaded, and governmental restrictions have been on the movement of ships, occasioning further delay, which added some four days to the time usually occupied on the voyage, and the voyage is attended by danger of attack by submarines.<sup>57</sup>

The charterer of a British ship to carry cargo to such of certain European ports as he may designate is not justified, by the breaking out of war between Great Britain and Germany, in refusing to load a cargo, where it appeared that none of the named ports were blockaded, and that other vessels carried cargoes safely at about the same time, notwithstanding the war greatly increased insurance rates and disorganized the usual arrangements by which exporters obtained pay for their goods.<sup>58</sup>

Where the master of a ship contracted to load a full cargo of goods at St. Petersburg for transportation to England, it was held not a defense to an action for a breach of the charter party, in that the ship sailed from St. Petersburg with only half a cargo, that the nonperformance was due to a bona fide apprehension, which was reasonable and well grounded, that the Russian government intended to lay an embargo on all British vessels, which might take effect immediately, and that the embargo was in fact laid six weeks later.<sup>59</sup>

A contract for the construction of a waterworks reservoir to be completed within six years, and involving an expenditure of approximately £670,000, is subject to an implied term or condition that the liability of performance shall cease in the event of lawful action of the government, the effect of which is to impose a delay more than temporary and of uncertain duration; so that where the action of the Minister of Munitions, under powers conferred upon him by law, in ordering the contractor to cease work and to dispose of a large portion of his equipment to the owners of certain munition factories, has occasioned a stoppage of indefinite duration, the contract is at an end.<sup>64</sup>

and, if not then terminated, for five years from the end of the preliminary period, has been held not to be dissolved by the internment, for the period of one month, of the employee, who, though born in Germany, was released by reason of his being an Alsatian of French extraction with anti-German sympathies, the interruption thereby occasioned not being sufficient to cause a substantial frustration of the business engagement.<sup>65</sup>

Where the parties are shown to have contracted with reference to the existence of a state of war, there is, of course, no basis for reading into the contract an implied reservation in case of difficulty or impossibility of performance occasioned by war conditions.<sup>66</sup> Thus, it is no defense to an action on a charter party for nonperformance that the port of destination was in a state of blockade, if the defendant knew the fact at the time of entering into the charter party.<sup>67</sup> And performance of a contract made during war, the parties to which were mindful of its existence and contracted with reference to it, is not excused by an abnormal rise in ocean freights, rendering its performance unprofitable.<sup>68</sup> And it has been held that the disturbing, unsettled, and irregular conditions affecting cable service to European points due to the war will not relieve the cable company, in an action to recover the usual charges for transmitting and delivering messages, from proving the fact of delivery.<sup>69</sup>

Thus a contract for a transatlantic passage is reasonably to be interpreted as subject to provisions relating to governmental direction and acts, as well as to interference by conditions of war, particularly if set forth on the ticket; and a passenger who ran the risk of a declaration of war, by his presence in a foreign country, cannot claim breach of contract, where the voyage was abandoned because of the mobilization of members of the crew, the restraint upon the sailing of boats that might be needed by the government, and a constructive seizure of the supply of coal.<sup>70</sup>

That is to say, that the obligation to ship is absolute. In my opinion, if it were an absolute obligation, it would be contrary to the law of England which governs this case. There was at the time of making the contract, and at all material times, a prohibition against the export of aluminium except under a license. If a license cannot be obtained aluminium cannot be shipped, and I cannot see why the law should imply an absolute obligation to do that which the law forbids. A shipment contrary to the prohibition would be illegal, and an absolute obligation to ship could not be enforced. I cannot agree that, in order to give to the contract its business efficacy, it is a necessary implication that the sellers undertook an absolute obligation to ship whether a license was or was not obtained. A party to a contract may warrant that he will obtain a license, but no such term can be implied in this case. The reasonable view of the contract, in my opinion, having regard to the statement in The Moorcock (1889) L. R. 14 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 68, 58 L. J. Prob. N. S. 73, 60 L. T. N. S. 654, 37 Week. Rep. 439, 6 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 373, is that the sellers sold subject to their being able to ship under a license, and that they impliedly undertook to use their best endeavors to obtain a license. The umpire has found that they used their best endeavors, the failure to ship being due to their inability to obtain a license, and therefore there has been no breach of contract."

tion is applicable to a time charter party, and whether it is to be applied in a particular case depends upon the circumstances. The main consideration is the probable length of the total deprivation of use of the vessel as compared with the unexpired duration of the charter party.<sup>74</sup> It has been held that the object of a charter party for a Baltic round at a certain rate of hire per month until redelivered, excepting arrests and restraint of princes, and providing that no voyage should be undertaken that would involve risk of seizure or capture; and that in the event of Great Britain or other European power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer at the commencement or during the currency of the charter, the charterer should have the option of canceling the charter or insuring the steamer against all war risks for full value,—was frustrated so as to determine the charter party, where the breaking out of the European War while the vessel was in the Gulf of Finland prevented her from completing her voyage for an indefinite length of time.<sup>75</sup>

Where the breaking out of war operates to increase the risk which the promisor has undertaken, performance is excused. Thus, a carrier may, upon the breaking out of war, properly discharge a contraband cargo at an intermediate port where to proceed will expose it to risk of seizure.<sup>76</sup> And a ship may be excused from proceeding to the destination designated by the charter or bill of lading where at the time of its turning back there were reasonable grounds for apprehension that to do so would expose it to the risk of capture, though the cargo, being the property of a neutral, would not run such risk.<sup>77</sup> And the charterers of a vessel are not entitled to recover compensation on account of delay in performing the voyage where the European War, even though the publishers published and offered for sale copies of the so-called souvenir and program prior to the date fixed for the event, under the rule that, where the performance of an agreement depends upon the happening of an event over which neither party has any control, an implied condition will be read into the agreement to the effect that the contract shall be abrogated upon the nonhappening of such an event.

A. 518, 288 Fed. 668, which reversed (1916) 228 Fed. 946, it was held that performance of a contract of carriage from New York to Plymouth, England, evidenced by a bill of lading in the usual form, and not shown to have been entered into with a view to war, was excused, where the master of a German steamship, knowing war to be imminent, and having received a wireless message from the directors of the steamship company stating that war had broken out, turned back when distant from Plymouth about 1,070 miles, and he had then proceeded about as far as he could with coal enough to return if that should prove needful, although war had not in fact been declared, and if nothing unforeseen had happened he might, in fact, have delivered the shipment and escaped capture by the margin of a few hours.

It would seem that the probability must be so strong as to be equivalent to certainty. Compare cases in footnote 42, supra.

such delay was occasioned by a reasonable apprehension of capture.<sup>78</sup>

Of course, where the risk is not in fact increased, the rule is inapplicable. Thus, performance of a neutral's contract to carry to a blockaded port is not excused where the blockade is not actual and effective.<sup>79</sup>

Seamen signing for a peaceful commercial voyage are justified, under the principle above stated, in refusing to proceed to a belligerent port with a contraband cargo, where there is reasonable apprehension of capture en route;<sup>80</sup> and seamen who have engaged for a voyage at a time when risks of war were not in contemplation are discharged from the obligation to proceed where there is basis for a reasonable apprehension of loss of life or liberty.<sup>81</sup> And where the master of a ship, the crew of which had agreed to serve on an ordinary trading voyage, had, without their knowledge, taken on contraband of war at a port of call, and the ship had been captured and confiscated, it was held that, as the shipowners had, through their agent, broken the contract of hiring by materially altering the character of the voyage, the service of the seamen was not "terminated," within the meaning of § 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, when the ship was captured; and that the plaintiff, one of the crew, was entitled to recover his wages up to the date of his arrival at the home port, and damages for breach of the agreement.<sup>82</sup>

<sup>88</sup> Where an employer agreed that upon the withdrawal of the employee from her service she would pay her traveling expenses or secure a passage for her to her native country on board a first-class sailing vessel, the fact that by reason of a blockade of the port it has become impossible to engage the passage does not excuse her from performing the alternative of paying the employee's traveling expenses. *Jacquinet v. may give rise to one or the other of two questions: First, whether in accordance with the truism that no term or condition can be implied in the contract which is inconsistent with its express terms,<sup>89</sup> such provision excludes the possibility of dissolution of the contract by alteration of the circumstances under which it comes to be performed; and, second, whether such provision operates to excuse performance in the contingency which has arisen.

With respect to the first of these questions it has been held that "although the words of the stipulation may be such that the mere letter would describe what has occurred, the occurrence itself may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation."<sup>90</sup>

So, an exception in a charter party of "restraint of princes" does not extend to every restraint, however prolonged, and the effect of which is to frustrate the adventure.<sup>91</sup>

And a provision in a charter party, that in the event of Great Britain or any other European power being involved in war affecting the working of the chartered vessel at the commencement or during the currency of the charter, the charterers shall have the option of canceling the charter or insuring the vessel against all war risks for full value, does not prevent the implication of a condition that the charter shall be void in case of commercial frustration of the object of the adventure by war.<sup>92</sup>

The doctrine of frustration of the adventure as terminating the contract is not excluded by the terms of a charter party, giving the charterers the option of canceling should the steamer not have been delivered by a certain date, and stipulating that should it be proved that the steamer through unforeseen circumstances could not be delivered by such date, the charterers, if required, should, within forty-eight hours after receiving notice thereof, declare whether they would cancel or would take delivery of the steamer, and also that the charterers should have the option of canceling the charter party should the steamer be commandeered by the government during the charter.<sup>93</sup>

any orders, drawings, or directions, or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, objections, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences whatsoever and howsoever occasioned, the contractor shall in the opinion of the engineer (whose decision shall be final) have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of this contract, it shall be lawful for the engineer, if he shall so think fit, to grant an extension of time, does not cover a case in which the interruption is of such a character and duration as vitally and fundamentally to change the conditions of the contract, and which could not possibly have been in the contemplation of the parties to the contract when it was made, such as a suspension of work for an indefinite period by order of the government.<sup>94</sup>

Whether a provision in a contract suspending or excusing performance in certain contingencies covers a case where war conditions have interfered with its performance depends upon the construction to be placed upon the language employed.

The exception of "restraint of princes" in a charter party does not excuse the owner from liability for nonperformance, though his refusal was founded upon a reasonable apprehension, justified by the event, of a restraint not then existing.<sup>95</sup> But if the restraint is actual and existing, refusal to perform will be justified, though the event proves performance possible.<sup>96</sup>

It has been said that the authorities seem to show that in the event of a restraint of princes the obligation of a shipowner (in the absence of any special provision) is to wait a reasonable time for the purpose of ascertaining whether the restraint is likely to be of such a duration as to render it impossible commercially to carry out the contract, and that the question of what is a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.<sup>97</sup>

It has been held that the owners of a vessel as well as its charterers may be justified, under the restraint of princes clause, in treating the charter party as at an end where the vessel is requisitioned by the government, unless it appears that the compensation to be paid by the government therefor is intended to be a full equivalent for the going rate.<sup>98</sup>

In order to bring an action within the exception in a charter party of restraint of princes, the restraint must be an actual and operative restraint, and not a merely expected and contingent one; hence expectation of an embargo by reason of which the ship sailed before being fully loaded is no defense to an action for breach of an undertaking to load a full cargo. Atkinson v. Ritchie (1809) 10 East, 530, 103 Eng. Reprint, 877, 10 Revised Rep. 372.

party excepting arrests and restraint of princes, rulers, and peoples, to carry grain from a port in the Sea of Azoff, were justified, upon the outbreak of war between Greece and Turkey before the expiration of the lay days while the vessel was loading, in throwing up the charter party, there being at the time no reasonable probability that Turkey would allow Greek ships to pass through the Dardanelles during the war; and this although, had the ship been loaded in her lay days or in her demurrage days, she might have taken advantage of the permission unexpectedly accorded by the Turkish government, for a limited time, to Greek ships to pass through the Dardanelles.

A charter party between "A, agents and owners, of the good screw steamer to be named of 1,500 tons dead weight and B. & Co., charterers," is one to supply tonnage, and not merely one to furnish a vessel of which the first parties are owners or agents; hence a requisition by the government of available vessels owned or controlled by the contractors is not such a prevention of performance as to entitle the contractors to the benefit of the exception of "restraint of princes."<sup>99</sup>

An exception of "restraint of princes" in a charter party justifies a vessel in refusing to load a cargo where, after the making of the contract and while it still remains wholly unperformed, the port of destination is blockaded; and the vessel is not bound to wait for more than a reasonable time to see whether the blockade will continue.<sup>100</sup> But the exception does not apply where the blockade of the port of destination existed when the charter party was entered into.<sup>101</sup>

An exception in a charter party of restraint of princes operates to protect the owners of a Swedish ship chartered for a period of six months for trading between certain ports all of which were outside of Sweden, from liability for refusal to perform, where by Swedish emergency legislation the ship was prohibited from carrying goods for freight between ports outside the Swedish Kingdom, the owners and master being rendered liable to imprisonment for any breach of that prohibition, though the charter was a British contract, and the vessel was at the time of the refusal not within the power of the Swedish authorities.<sup>102</sup>

The exception in a bill of lading of "restraints of princes and rulers of people" justifies the refusal of the master of a neutral vessel to carry contraband to a belligerent port where to do so will expose it to the risk of seizure.<sup>103</sup> But a stipulation that the carrier shall not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by arrest or restraint of princes, rulers, or people, does not justify a refusal to perform because of the contraband character of the cargo, where the contract was entered into with full knowledge of the existence of the possibility of interception and seizure.<sup>104</sup>

An exception in a contract by a British subject to provide a ship (to be nominated) for a certain voyage, of "public enemies and restraint of princes," will relieve the contractor from liability where, after the breaking out of war between Great Britain and Germany, the voyage has become impossible without subjecting the ship and cargo to German control, thereby shutting out of the market the tonnage of Great Britain and her Allies and subjecting neutral shipowners to the possibility of German seizure of the cargo, in which case no freight would be earned, rendering it doubtful whether the freight could have been insured, even at a high rate.<sup>105</sup>

A provision in a charter party that in the event of Great Britain or other European power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer at the commencement or during the currency of the charter, the charterer shall have the option of canceling the charter or insuring the steamer against all war risks for its full value, does not enable the charterer to cancel the charter after the vessel has been exposed to the risk and has been detained indefinitely by a sovereign who has become involved in war, when the vessel is no longer insurable and when the charterer is unable to redeliver it to the owner, either immediately or within any reasonable time.<sup>107</sup>

A provision in a contract to carry goods by sea between certain British ports, making an exception in the case of "perils of the seas, enemies, pirates, arrests, and restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples," does not exonerate the carrier where, although restrictions causing delay were imposed by the government and the voyage was rendered dangerous by enemy submarines, the making of the voyage was not prohibited or rendered impossible.<sup>108</sup>

It has been held that the owner of a vessel which had deviated from her voyage and was afterward sunk by an enemy submarine cannot claim the benefit of an exception in the bill of lading of "King's enemies."<sup>109</sup> This is true, however, only where an unjustifiable deviation is regarded as doing away with the special contract altogether, leaving the rights of the parties to be governed by the ordinary rules applicable to the relation of carrier and shipper. As to whether it is to be so regarded, there is a difference of opinion.<sup>110</sup>

An exception in a bill of lading of "the King's enemies" protects the carrier from the consequences of a hostile seizure.<sup>111</sup>

It has been held that a charter party providing: "In the event of war, blockade, or prohibition of export preventing loading, this charter party to be canceled," became void, and not merely voidable, where in consequence of war the government closed the ports of loading mentioned in the charter party.<sup>112</sup>

freight, under a provision of the bill of lading requiring freight to be prepaid and that freight earned shall be irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost, notwithstanding there was no exception of "restraints of princes, rulers and peoples."<sup>113</sup>

The capture of a vessel abrogates any lien on its cargo for freight notwithstanding such cargo may have been shipped under bills of lading which specifically agreed that "freight is due on shipment and shall be considered as then earned and shall be paid on demand, ship or goods lost or not lost;" and that the shipowners "should have a lien and right of sale . . . over the goods shipped under this, not only for the freight and charges due thereon whether payable in advance or not, but also for all amounts in any wise to become payable to them under the provisions of this, although the same may not then be ascertained or payable;" nor is such lien reinstated by the restoration of the vessel to its owners by the action of a neutral government, because of the captor's violation of its neutrality laws.<sup>114</sup>

The word "safe" when used in connection with "port," in the provision of a bill of lading exonerating the carrier should the port of discharge prove unsafe, implies that the port must be both physically and politically safe, and the action either of nature or man may render a port unsafe; and therefore the liability of a ship to be sunk or confiscated by enemy vessels on a voyage to a port may be taken into account, although the port itself is safe.<sup>115</sup> case the ship shall be prevented from reaching her destination by war or the hostile act of any power, the master may wait until the impeding obstacle be removed, or discharge the goods into any depot, or at any convenient port, or bring her cargo back to port of shipment, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, and that the carrier is absolved from loss by arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, or peoples. *Standard Varnish Works v. In this case the court held that, notwithstanding the declaration by Germany that the waters surrounding Great Britain, including the whole of the English channel, was a military area, and that from February 18, 1915, every hostile or merchant ship within these waters would be destroyed, New castle was a safe port in respect of a voyage from Havre to that port, on the ground that the results of the declaration were insignificant and had not appreciably affected the strength or spirit of the British Merchant Marine.

A port is unsafe by reason of war to which it is consigned in case the master shall consider it unsafe for any reason to enter or discharge cargo there, unless the facts show a reasonable necessity therefor.<sup>115</sup>

A vessel hired before the breaking out of the European War, under a charter party which provides that "no voyage be undertaken and no goods, documents, or persons shipped that would involve risk of seizure, capture, repatriation, or penalty by rulers or governments," is not bound to undertake a voyage which will subject it to the risk of being attacked and sunk by German submarines.<sup>117</sup>

Inability on the part of the owners of a vessel to obtain a crew for the voyage for which the vessel was chartered, because of German submarine activity, is within the provision of the charter party that "the owners shall not be liable for any delay in the commencement or prosecution of the voyage due to a strike or lockout of seamen . . . or dispute involving or preventing the engagement of the crew or part of the crew."<sup>118</sup>

The discharge and warehousing at Port Empedocle, Sicily, by the master of an Austrian vessel bound from Trieste to New York via Sicilian ports, of sulphur shipped at that port, which had become contraband of war by reason of the outbreak of the war between servants of the shipowners or charterers of the vessel or of their respective agents . . . in the navigation or management of the ship,"—does not cover the conduct of the master in delaying the ship at an intermediate port for reasons of safety.<sup>119</sup>

The provisions of a charter party that the owners will supply the ship in every way fitted for service, and will "maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service," and that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, . . . for more than twenty-four running hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service," do not have the effect to render the owners chargeable with loss of time and expense occasioned by an order of the British Admiralty, requiring her to be armed, and in waiting for gunners and ammunition, without which the French government refused to allow her to leave.<sup>120</sup>

Delay in unloading, by congestion owing to the war, is not covered by a charter provision that, "in case, of strikes, lockouts . . . or any other causes beyond the control of the con-

The construction of a provision in a contract of sale, purporting to exonerate the seller from liability for damage or delay occasioned by war, may be affected by the circumstance that the contract was entered into after the outbreak of war. Thus, it has been held that the seller of prussiate of soda, a German product, was not excused from performing his contract by a clause therein providing: "Sellers not liable . . . for losses or damage or delays due to causes beyond their control, including in such causes . . . war or insurrection," where, the contract having been entered into after the existence of war between Germany and Great Britain, the parties must have contemplated that Great Britain would attempt to prevent the exportation of German goods, or that Germany might forbid exportation; such clause being considered, under the circumstances, as having reference to war between Germany and the United States.<sup>122</sup> And even though the condition may be construed as covering the situation, it does not exonerate the seller where he had on hand or received after the beginning of the war more than enough goods to fully perform all his contracts, where, instead of applying them to such contracts, he apportioned such goods among his regular customers in proportion to the usual monthly requirements of each, regardless of whether the customer had a written contract, an oral contract, or no contract at all.<sup>123</sup>

About the only generalization to which the decisions hereinafter reviewed lend themselves is that a provision in general language, purporting to exonerate the seller from the consequence of nonperformance where occasioned by contingencies for which he is not responsible, will not protect him from the abnormal rise in prices occasioned by war conditions.

Thus, a rise in the price of an article occasioned by a shortage of supply caused by war is not a hindrance to delivery within the meaning of a provision of a contract for the sale of a quantity of such article, that deliveries may be suspended pending any contingencies, such as war, preventing or hindering the manufacture or delivery of the article. To constitute prevention there must be physical or legal prevention; to constitute "hindering" there must be the same causes operating to a less degree, but economic unprofitableness will not do.<sup>124</sup>

A provision in a contract for the sale of coal to be delivered in monthly quantities, that "in case of war . . . or other hindrances intervening or interfering or affecting delivery," the sellers might at their option suspend partly or entirely any deliveries under the contract, does not entitle the sellers to suspend deliveries where war has occasioned a rise in the price of coal, where sufficient coal is procurable at the enhanced price.<sup>125</sup>

Sellers of wood pulp to be delivered in monthly quantities during a period of years are "hindered," within the meaning of a contract provision that "the sellers may suspend delivery under this contract pending any contingency beyond their control which prevents or hinders the delivery of the pulp, namely, . . . war," where, owing to war conditions, there has

A shortage of an article occasioned by the fact of war with the country where such article is chiefly produced, rendering it impossible for the vendor to obtain sufficient to fulfil its contract obligations to its customers, and to supply ordinary demands, may be considered as "hindering" delivery thereof within the meaning of a provision in a contract for the sale of the quantity of such article, that deliveries may be "suspended pending any contingencies beyond the control of the sellers or buyers (such as . . . war . . . ) causing a short supply of labor, fuel, raw material, or manufactured produce, or otherwise preventing or hindering the manufacture or delivery of the article," notwithstanding other customers have acquiesced in the suspension of deliveries under their contracts, thereby leaving their quotas at the vendor's disposal.<sup>127</sup>

If Great Britain or France shall be engaged in war with a European power, the contract is subject to cancellation by the suppliers;" but had attached to it a slip containing the following provision: "Notwithstanding the war clause in the attached contract, it is understood that the depots will supply during the present hostilities, so long and in such quantities as the port authorities will permit, and should circumstances arise to further interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of coals, this contract is subject to cancellation by the suppliers,"—it was held that the difficulty of obtaining vessels for the shipment of coal to the coaling depot, due to a physical scarcity and not merely to extra expense, was such an interference within the meaning of the foregoing contract provision as to entitle the suppliers to cancel.<sup>128</sup>

A provision in a contract for the sale of dyes known by the purchaser to be of German origin: "Sellers not to be held accountable for delays caused by strikes or for any contingencies beyond their control, or other unavoidable accidents, such as fire, etc.,"—exonerates the sellers where as

The reasoning of the court of appeal in this case may be represented by the following excerpt from the opinion of Eve, J.: "If upon ordinary occasions I have three alternative means of reaching this building, and on a particular occasion I find that two of such means have been suddenly suspended, by reason of a sympathetic strike or for some other cause, and the third is so overcrowded as to preclude my using it, I should say those facts amount to a hindrance of my arrival here; none the less so, if, by reason of some gratuitous lift in a motor car, I ultimately reach my destination. The analogy may not be exact; but it indicates sufficiently the ground upon which my conclusion is based. With regard to the argument pressed upon us that Messrs. Becker & Co., at the higher freights and under the circumstances aforesaid, could have obtained ships and delivered the pulp required by the respondents, it must be borne in mind that the mere fact that there was a possibility of surmounting the hindrance does not do away with or remove the hindrance. If the hindrance is unsurmountable, then it becomes prevention, and no longer hindrance."

a result of conditions arising from the existence of the state of war they are unable to obtain their usual supply of goods.<sup>129</sup> But it has been held that the contingency of foreign war and embargoes laid by foreign powers is not covered by a provision in a contract of sale in favor of the seller that "contingencies beyond our control, fires, strikes, accidents to our works or to our stock, or change in tariff, will allow us to cancel this contract or any part of the same at our option," the court saying: "We think the reasonable construction of this contract is to be found by applying to it the rule, eiusdem generis, and that the words, 'fire, strike, accidents to our works or to our stock, or change in tariff' (all of which events are or may be beyond the control of the parties), must be held to limit and qualify the 'contingencies beyond our control' and to confine the happenings which would justify the cancelation of the contract to those of a like nature to the ones enumerated, which an embargo is not."<sup>130</sup>

A provision in a contract for the sale of spelter, that "delays en route or other contingencies beyond our control to be sufficient excuse for any delay traceable to these causes," does not protect the seller from liability for failure to perform where in consequence of war his source of supply is cut off, if he is able to procure spelter elsewhere, although at an abnormally high price.<sup>131</sup>

A provision in a contract by which sellers in Spain agreed to deliver iron ore to buyers in England, that "in the event of a European war, restraint of princes or governments, civil commotion, accidents, strikes, imminent hostilities preventing the carrying out of this contract, and all other causes . . . beyond the personal control of the seller, the contract to be suspended during that period at the seller's option," does not exonerate the seller from performance where, in consequence of a rise in freights, performance has ceased to be profitable.<sup>132</sup>

Under a clause in a contract for the sale of goods for export, that deliveries may be suspended pending contingencies beyond the control of the seller, the seller is exonerated where, during the time for delivery of certain instalments, there was a governmental prohibition, which did not exist at the time of making the contract, of the export of such goods without a license; nor were the sellers under any obligation, the contract being to deliver f. o. b. a vessel to be designated by the buyers at an English port, to use their best endeavors to obtain a license.<sup>133</sup>

That is some distinction from the case which has already been decided in this court (Anglo-Russian Merchants Traders v. John Batt & Co. (1917) 116 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 805), in which a contract was made at the time when there was an existing prohibition, and a question arose whose duty it was to provide the licenses, exportation not being possible without a license. In that case, which was a c. and f. contract, Bailhache, J., had held that a man who had contracted to sell at a time when there was a prohibition of export except by license undertook to get the license or pay damages. This court held that, as there was a finding of fact that the seller had done all in his power to get a license, at any rate his obligation was not higher than that, and he was not therefore liable. In this case I think it becomes necessary to go further, and to decide whether in this f. o. b. contract the obligation to get a license in case there should, after the making of the contract, be a prohibition against export, except with a ply of print paper to the effect that "all orders are subject to strike or lockout clauses and force majeure, fire, or breakdown," does not avail the seller where the only difficulty in the way of performance occasioned by the war interfering with the sources of supply is an increase in price.<sup>134</sup>

A provision in a c. i. f. contract for the sale of Japanese beans that should shipment be prevented by (inter alia) hostilities, "this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof may be canceled," does not exonerate the seller where shipping was obtainable, though at a very high price.<sup>135</sup>

A clause in a contract to sell and deliver a quantity of iron pyrites to be delivered during a period of years, suspending the seller's obligation to deliver "if war . . . or any other cause over which the sellers have no control should prevent them from shipping or exporting ore from the river Guadiana, Portugal, or delivering under normal conditions," does not exonerate the seller where the only obstacle in the way of performance is a rise in freights rendering performance unprofitable; the term "under normal conditions" having application to shipping and delivering, and not to transportation.<sup>136</sup>

A provision in a contract by which sellers in Spain agree to deliver iron ore to buyers in England, that "in case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines, the supplies of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuance thereof, and the time for delivery extended proportionately. In the case of partial stoppage of works or mines, the delivery is to be pro rata with other then-existing engagements,"—is to be read as if it was "in case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any other unavoidable cause occasioning total or partial stoppage of works or mines," and hence does not exonerate the seller from performance of the contract where a rise in freights occasioned by war conditions renders it unprofitable.<sup>137</sup>

Where in consequence of the cutting off by war of the German demand for ore from certain Spanish mines, the mines were closed down, the case is within the provision of a contract for the supply of a quantity of ore of a quality obtainable only from such mines, that "in the event . . . of war . . . affecting . . . the mines . . . at which the ore was intended to be worked, the contract should, at the option of the party affected, be suspended wholly or partially according to the extent of the cause or occurrence during the continuance thereof," and this, although the seller at the time of giving notice of the suspension had on hand a quantity of ore which it might have appropriated toward the performance of the contract.<sup>138</sup>

A provision in a contract of sale of goods to be shipped from a foreign port between certain dates, that license, lies upon the seller or buyer. In my view it lies upon the buyer. The buyer must provide an effective ship—that is to say, a ship that can legally, and as it is bound to by contract, carry the goods. When the buyer has done that, the seller may ship the goods he has contracted to ship. If that is so, the license to export is a buyer's matter. It is the sending of a ship out of the country after the goods are put on board, and it does not make it a seller's matter by a statutory prohibition of the goods being put on the quay if their export is prohibited. Putting on the quay is only subsidiary to the exporting, which is the real matter of the license. In my view, therefore, of the general question in a contract of

The British sellers of vessels to the United States government were "prevented" from performing their engagement to deliver the ships in New York within the meaning of a provision in the contract of sale that, "if from blockade or any other cause arising from the United States becoming belligerents and preventing delivery of either of said steamers, this contract is to be null and void, but the vendor to retain the deposit as and for liquidated damages," where, in consequence of the outbreak of war between the United States and Spain before the ships sailed, the effect of delivery would be to expose the sellers to the penalties of the British Foreign Enlistment Act.<sup>140</sup>

A provision in a contract of sale performable by a tender of goods in a foreign port, that such goods must at the time of the tender "be free of all customs formalities required prior to export," does not prevent from being good a tender at a time when an embargo on the exportation of such goods has been laid by the government.<sup>141</sup>

In order to enable a seller of wheat in Great Britain to take advantage of a provision in a contract of sale that "in case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities, preventing shipment or delivery of wheat to this country, the sellers shall have the option of canceling this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof," it is not necessary that there should be an absolutely total prohibition of export of wheat to Great Britain, but it is sufficient if there is a prohibition of such an extent and of such force as that either a considerable source of supply of wheat to Great Britain is shut up thereby, or that a very considerable rise in the price of wheat in Great Britain should be occasioned by the prohibition.<sup>142</sup>

A provision incorporated into a contract of sale by reference to another contract "that in case of force majeure, as strikes or combinations of workmen or accidents, war, or mobilization, or want of raw material arising through suppliers of works not fulfilling obligations entered into, or any other occurrence which may partially or wholly interfere with the delivery, the same may be partially or wholly suspended during the continuance of any or either of these occurrences. APPEAL by defendant Hildebrand from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Monroe, McClure, & Monroe and S. M. Hutzel for appellant.

Messrs. Edwin Anderson and Frans E. Lindquist, for appellee:

There was nothing in the letter from Clay Hamilton, as receiver of the insurance company, which could, in the least degree, have prejudiced the rights of defendant Hildebrand.

State Sav. Asso. v. Hunt, 17 Kan. 532.

To constitute notice of infirmity in an instrument, or defect in the title of the person negotiating it, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or such knowledge that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith.

People's Bank v. Reid, 86 Kan. 245, 120 Pac. 339; Farnsworth v. Burdick, 94 Kan. 749, 147 Pac. 868.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bank recovered judgment against C. M. Hildebrand on a promissory note, and he appeals.

Hildebrand gave his note for $367.50 in payment of premiums for policies of insurance issued by the Topeka Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company upon live stock owned by him. He claims that there was no consideration for the note, and that the bank was not a purchaser in good faith. On September 9, 1915, at the time the policies were issued, the Topeka Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company was insolvent. The losses under Hildebrand's policies amounted to $205, for which he never received anything. The state insurance department made an investigation of the company in February, 1915, and each month thereafter, and the reports on file in the office of the superintendent show that at no time after February, 1915, was the company solvent, and that its liabilities were $64,000, and its assets practically nothing. Notwithstanding the insolvent condition of the company, it was permitted to do business until December, 1915, when an action was brought by the state, and the company placed in the hands of a receiver.

J. H. White, who organized the company, was its president, and also president of the White Insurance Agency, which appears to have been a tradename under which the insurance company transferred its premium notes. The day following the issuance of the policies the note in question was indorsed by the insurance company to the White agency, and transferred the next day by that agency to the bank. At the same time seventy other premium notes, given by various farmers throughout the western part of the state, were transferred to the bank; thirty-five of these aggregated $1,962.56, and thirty-six aggregated $2,001.97. The vice president of the insurance company negotiated the delivery of the notes to the bank, and at the same time gave the bank two notes, signed by the White Insurance Agency, one for $1,962.56, and the other for $2,001.97, receiving from the bank certificates of deposit for like amounts. The bank claimed to hold the two notes of the insurance agency, indorsed by the insurance company, as collateral to the seventy-one farmers' or premium notes. The latter, as well as the two large notes, bore 10 per cent interest; the certificates of deposit which the bank gave in exchange for the notes bore 3 per cent interest. The bank had been in the business of purchasing the insurance company's premium notes in the same manner, and had already issued certificates of deposit to the amount of over $4,000, in exchange for notes which, together with those issued at the time the Hildebrand note was purchased, amounted to over $8,000; and this was 44 per cent of the bank's capital stock and surplus. The cashier testified that she knew the bank was permitted to loan upon the security of any one person or corporation no more than 15 per cent of the bank's capital stock and surplus, and knew the Hildebrand note represented the payment of premiums on live stock, and understood that if a loss occurred the maker would have a claim against the insurance company as a set-off against the note, if held by the insurance company, and knew, also, that there would probably be losses under the policies.

In answer to special questions, the jury found that the bank acted in good faith and without knowledge of any infirmity in the paper.

The contentions of the appellant are: First, that there was error in the admission of testimony; second, that the court should have directed a verdict; third, that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions.

The bank was permitted to introduce a letter written by Clay Hamilton, receiver of the insurance company, to Hildebrand, dated March 22, 1916. The letter was an apology for a former one, asking Hildebrand to pay a note which Hamilton found among the papers of the insurance company, and which, it seems, was given in renewal of the first premium note. The letter stated that the receiver, not knowing the earlier history of the transactions, assumed the original note had been surrendered to Hildebrand, and that there was due the company the amount stated in the first letter, but informed him that he would not be called upon to make any payment on that note. The portion of the letter objected to was the statement that the receiver, after making an investigation, had found that Hildebrand's note was sold to the White Insurance Agency, and later, by that agency, sold to the bank. The grounds of objection urged are that it was a statement of matters concerning which the receiver could have had no personal knowledge, which occurred before he became receiver, and that his testimony was hearsay, and necessarily derived from the books of the company,

hearsay—statement without

which would be the best evidence.

These were all good grounds for the objection to the admission of the letter as a whole. We are unable to discover for what purpose it was offered or admitted;

of the jurymen, on their voir dire examination, testified they were personally acquainted with the receiver, and notwithstanding the fact that his letter was referred to, in the argument of counsel for bank, as evidence that the cashier acted in good faith. There is no dispute as to the facts concerning the manner in which the bank became the holder of the note, so far as the fact of indorsement and transfer is concerned. Prima facie, the indorsement and transfer of the note gave the bank a good title. —transfer of note.

Nothing contained in the letter written by the receiver purported to throw any light whatever upon the good faith of the transaction between the bank and the insurance company, which was the only question at issue.

It is urged that the verdict of the jury, as well as the finding of fact that the bank acted in good faith, is contrary to the evidence, and especially the testimony of the cashier, to which we have referred. The argument is that, when a person knows there may be a set-off or counterclaim against the note by the time it matures, he cannot acquire the note free from an infirmity. The argument is not sound. Every purchaser of a promissory note knows that, as between the maker and the payee, there may, before the note matures, arise a set-off or counterclaim in favor of the maker; but this will not prevent the purchaser from being a holder in due course, nor is the fact, of itself, evidence of bad faith in purchasing. The cashier did not testify that she knew the company was insolvent, or that the note was given without consideration. No authorities are cited by the appellant in support of his contention, and we think none are necessary to show its fallacy.

The provision of the statute making it unlawful for a bank to loan more than 15 per cent of its capital stock and surplus upon the security of any one person or corporation (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 530) was not enacted for the benefit of a person in the situation of the appellant. It was to protect the rights of depositors and creditors of the bank that the law was enacted, as a measure of sound public policy. The insurance company, if sued upon notes executed to the bank, could not raise the defense that the bank had extended it a loan in excess of the authorized amount; and the special finding of the jury is that the bank purchased appellant's note in good faith, for value, and without notice of any fact that would put it on inquiry that the insurance company was insolvent. Besides, the general verdict is a finding that no loan was made to the insurance company; its notes having been taken merely as collateral security for the payment of appellant's note, and others purchased at the same time.

The appellant requested the following instruction, which was refused: "You are further instructed that if you find that at the time of the transaction between the plaintiff bank and the insurance company the insurance company was insolvent, and the note sued on was without consideration, and the circumstances surrounding the transaction were such as to justify the conclusion that the failure on the part of the bank to make inquiry as to the consideration for the notes then taken by it, including the note executed by the defendant Hildebrand, arose from a suspicion that such inquiry would disclose a want of consideration for such notes, and if inquiry would have disclosed such want of consideration, then the plaintiff bank would be charged with the knowledge of such want of consideration as such inquiry would have revealed."

On this matter the court instructed that "to constitute 'notice' of an infirmity in the instrument, or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts, that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith. What is 'bad faith' in a case of this kind is a question of fact for the jury, and in this connection the court instructs you that neither a suspicion of defect of title, knowledge of circumstances which would excite such suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or put him on inquiry, nor even gross negligence on the part of the taker, will affect his rights, unless the circumstances or suspicions are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith."

The doctrine upon which the appellant relies is stated in 8 C. J. 505, taken from the opinion in Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343, 367, 15 L. ed. 984, 942, as follows: "While he is not obliged to make inquiries, he must not wilfully shut his eyes to the means of knowledge which he knows are at hand."

In the same section of Corpus Juris, however, it is stated that "certain facts are not, of themselves, sufficient to show bad faith in not making inquiry; yet it often happens that evidence thereof is admissible, and, together with evidence of other suspicious circumstances, sufficient to require the submission of the question of bad faith to the jury." Page 506.

The court submitted the question of bad faith to the jury in an instruction which correctly stated the law as applied to the evidence. People's Bank v. Reid, 86 Kan. 245, 120 Pac. 339. The appellant has not called our attention to any evidence which would have justified giving an instruction directing attention to the failure of the cashier to make inquiries as to any particular fact. The cashier admits knowledge of certain facts, which of themselves would not, as a matter of law, make the bank a purchaser in bad faith, but which were proper circumstances to be considered by the jury, with all the facts and circumstances, in determining that question. We do not understand that the evidence shows

—notice of defect. there was any fact or circumstance to cause the cashier to suspect that the insurance company was insolvent. Such is not the contention, and it is not suggested what inquiries she should have made which would have disclosed a want of consideration. If the company had not been insolvent, the issuing of the policies furnished a sufficient consideration for the note. On these facts it must be held there was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury that the bank acted in good faith, and the defendant, therefore, was not entitled to a directed verdict.

It is unfortunate for the appellant, and doubtless for many others, that a company organized and exploited, as this seems to have been, for the mere purpose of plundering the public, was permitted to continue so long in business; but, having put in circulation his negotiable promissory note, the appellant is compelled to pay, notwithstanding he received no consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

Dawson, J., dissenting:

This was not a case where the infirmities of the note could only be ascertained by the plaintiff by an inquiry which it was not bound to make, nor governed by the legal principles pertaining thereto. The bank's own officer, acting for the bank in the acquisition of the note, candidly admitted that she knew the conditions and terms of the contract for which the note was given, and I think the maker was entitled to set up the same defenses as would have been available against the original payee.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Porter, J., on January 11, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion (104 Kan. 10, 177 Pac. 526):

In a motion for rehearing, it is asserted the court entirely overlooked appellant's contentions, in determining that certain hearsay evidence was immaterial. The court overlooked nothing contended for by appellant in the original briefs, and adheres to the opinion that the letter from the receiver of the insurance company, although incompetent evidence, could not have prejudiced appellant by the statement that his note had been sold to the bank. All the evidence shows that it was transferred with others to the bank; and appellant has all along conceded that it was, although contending that it was held by the bank as collateral to other notes.

Appellant again argues his claim that the bank should have known there was something wrong, because an insurance company, which ordinarily has funds to invest, was parting with notes which, it is seriously contended, bore in the aggregate 20 per cent interest, and receiving in exchange a certificate of deposit bearing 3 per cent interest. While we had always supposed that collections of interest or principal of notes pledged as collateral security are applied upon the original indebtedness, instead of being used to swell the rate of interest on the principal debt, it was not deemed necessary to combat appellee's argument; and there was no suggestion in the opinion that it would not have been proper to have made the argument, for whatever it was worth, to the jury. We adhere to the opinion that the instruction on the question of bad faith correctly stated the law of the case, and that there were no circumstances in the evidence which would have justified an instruction directing special attention to the failure of the officer of the bank to make further inquiries.

The rehearing is denied.

National banks.

A person who has borrowed money from a national bank, and failed to pay it, cannot make the defense, when sued for it, that the bank had no right to loan the money, by reason of the act of Congress, providing that "the total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in."

32 Am. Rep. 438; McCartney v. Kipp (1895) 171 Pa. 644, 38 Atl. 233.

There has been since some change in the statute by chap. 3516 of the Laws of 1906, 34 Stat. at L. 451, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9761.

The foregoing cases from Massachusetts, New York, and Oregon follow, as bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Union Gold Min. Co. v. Rocky Mountain Nat. Bank (1877) 96 U. S. 640, 26 L. ed. 648, 1 Mor. Min. Rep. 432, supra, and perhaps we are so to understand the Arkansas and Iowa cases. The Supreme Court case is also cited on this point in Maryland Trust Co. v. National Mechanics' Bank (1906) 102 Md. 608, 63 Atl. 70; Bank of Cadiz v. Slemmons (1877) 34 Ohio St. 142, 32 Am. Rep. 364; and in Weber v. Spokane Nat. Bank (1894) 12 C. C. A. 98, 29 U. S. App. 97, 64 Fed. 208. It is also cited in Smith v. First Nat. Bank (1895) 45 Neb. 444, 63 N. W. 796, to the point that such a loan is not void.

In Union Gold Min. Co. v. Rocky Mountain Nat. Bank (U. S.) supra, the court said: "We do not think it required by public policy, or that Congress intended, that an excess of loans beyond the proportion specified should enable the borrower to avoid the payment of the money actually received by him. This would be to injure the interests of creditors, stockholders, and all who have an interest in the safety and prosperity of the bank."

The validity of notes taken by a cashier of a national bank, for loans in excess of the amount the bank could legally lend to one person, are not affected by the punishment of the cashier and the maker for depleting the assets of the bank in lending money without hope of its repayment, nor by the recovery by its receiver against the cashier's bondsman for his fraud and dishonesty. Re Edson (1902) 119 Fed. 487, supra.

In O'Hare v. Second Nat. Bank

(1874) 77 Pa. 96, it was held that an affidavit of defense, not alleging that the excess of indebtedness was known to the borrower, was no defense, it not thus appearing that there was any conspiracy to defeat the law. Followed in Mapes v. Second Nat. Bank (1875) 80 Pa. 163, cited in Allen v. First Nat. Bank (1889) 127 Pa. 51, 114 Am. St. Rep. 829, 17 Atl. 886.

The conspiracy question was disposed of in Stephens v. Monongahela Nat. Bank (1878) 88 Pa. 157, 32 Am. Rep. 438, supra, where the court said: "We have considered the offer as true, namely, that there was a conspiracy between the bank and the borrower to violate the statutory regulation. The question is whether the note is invalid on general principles of policy, and not one of equity and justice between the parties. The public good is the ground of relief to a defendant who proclaims his own turpitude in the wilful violation of a statute, and his shame in refusing payment of what he justly owes—not his worthiness. The bank is treated as a conspirator, but the fact is unmistakable that it was its officer. It is not the intendment of the statute to provide a way by which an unfaithful officer and dishonest stranger may empty the vaults of the bank, work its ruin, to the great loss of its shareholders and creditors, and the receiver of its money, wrapped in the mantle of public policy, escape liability."

State banks.

It is no defense to a bill of exchange that it was within the prohibition of the statute, providing that "it shall not be lawful for the president and directors of said bank to purchase or discount any draft or bill of exchange for a larger sum than $5,000," as such provision is directory. Bates v. Bank of Alabama (1841) 2 Ala. 457, where the court said: "Nothing can be clearer to our minds than that the borrower must refund the money. Any other construction would place the entire capital of the bank at the mercy of a venal directory and profligate borrowers."

In Nelson v. Leiter (1901) 190 Ill. 414, 83 Am. St. Rep. 142, 60 N. E. 851, the court said of the Illinois statute, which is similar to the provision heretofore quoted of the act of Congress: "There is no express declaration in the section that loans in excess of the statutory limitation shall not be collectable, and to so construe the section would be to defeat the very purpose which prompted the adoption of the section."

See also the reported case (ELMO STATE BANK v. HILDEBRAND, ante, 54).

A bond taken by a savings bank in excess of the amount which it is authorized to take by the statute of Iowa, limiting the amount of money that may be loaned to any person or firm, is not, for that reason, void; especially when it is not limited to indebtedness for borrowed money. Benton County Sav. Bank v. Boddicker (1898) 105 Iowa, 548, 45 L.R.A. 321, 67 Am. St. Rep. 310, 75 N. W. 632.

In sustaining a preference of a bank by an insolvent corporation, the Mississippi court said: "If the bank transcended its charter, and loaned a larger percentage of its capital to the mercantile company than its charter authorized it to lend to any one person, that was a matter between it and the state. This could in no way prevent the collection of the debt." Fargason v. Oxford Mercantile Co. (1900) 78 Miss. 65, 27 So. 877.

In affirming a judgment for a bank sued for conversion of stock, the Missouri supreme court stated that it was not necessary to go further than to hold that the bank's lien was good up to at least 25 per cent of the amount of its capital stock, and said: "The statute does not in terms declare void all contracts of loan to one person in excess of one fourth of the capital stock. It forbids a loan beyond that amount, but impliedly sanctions one to that limit. The transaction is not intrinsically immoral; and, whatever view may be taken as to such contracts when fully executed, it is obvious that, as the excess of the loan over the prescribed limit is readily severable from the part which is within that limit, the loan is valid, at least to the extent defined." McClintock v. Central

It is no defense to a mortgage, given by a bank president to the bank to secure an indebtedness in excess of one fifth of the bank's capital stock, that the statute provided that "no corporation or banker to which this chapter is applicable shall: (1) Make any loan or discount to any person, company, corporation or firm or upon paper upon which any such person, company, corporation or firm may be liable to an amount exceeding the one fifth part of its capital stock actually paid in and surplus." Dunn v. O'Connor (1898) 25 App. Div. 73, 49 N. Y. Supp. 270.

It is no defense (by a maker) to a note that one of its indorsers, when it was discounted by the plaintiff bank, was a director of the bank, already indebted to it to an amount exceeding 8 per cent of its capital stock, although the statute provided that the debts due from any director as principal indorser or surety shall not exceed 8 per cent of the capital stock. Richmond Bank v. Robinson (1856) 42 Me. 589.

A banking law, restricting loans to 10 per cent of the capital of the bank, is no defense to an action on a renewal of a greater loan. Farmers' Bank v. Burchard (1860) 33 Vt. 346.

Nelson v. Leiter (1901) 190 Ill. 414, 83 Am. St. Rep. 142, 60 N. E. 851, supra, does not refer to the two following earlier Illinois cases, which do not seem in accord with the general doctrine of the subject.

It was held in Penn v. Bornman (1882) 102 Ill. 523, that a bank cannot recover from one of its directors loans on which he was guarantor or indorser, made in defiance of the statute declaring that "no director of said corporation shall be indebted to said corporation, either directly or indirectly, or individually, at any time, to an amount greater than seventy-five per centum of the capital stock held by such director in his own name, in good faith as his own." The court considered that there was a lack of power to create the indebtedness.

This case was followed in Workingmen's Bkg. Co. v. Rautenberg (1882) 103 Ill. 460, 42 Am. Rep. 26.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County made during the trial of an action brought to recover for personal services rendered by plaintiff to defendant's intestate, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Tascus Atwood, Robert J. Curran, and Dana S. Williams, for defendant:

A judgment obtained in a foreign state is a bar to a second suit in another state.

Whiting v. Burger, 78 Me. 287, 4 Atl. 694; North Bank v. Brown, 50 Me. 214, 79 Am. Dec. 609; Sweet v. Brackley, 53 Me. 346; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 97 U. S. 331, 24 L. ed. 959; Peters v. Messrs. Payson & Virgin, for plaintiff:

A judgment against an administrator appointed in one state is not a bar to a suit on the same claim against an administrator of the same estate, appointed in another state.

Parsons v. Copeland, 33 Me. 370, 54 Am. Dec. 628; Sheldon v. White, 35 Me. 233; Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. 467, 11 L. ed. 1059; Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. 44, 12 L. ed. 337; McLean v. Meek, 18 How. 16, 15 L. ed. 277; Ela v. Edwards, 13 Allen, 48, 90 Am. Dec. 174; Low v. Bartlett, 8 Allen, 259.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of her death, intestate, the domicil of Sarah Wood Lemon was in Massachusetts. She there left property for administration, and she also left property to be administered in the state of Maine. Administrations were granted in the different states, first in Massachusetts and later in Maine, to one Bennett Benari. He accepted the distinct trusts. Alleging that she had rendered personal services for the intestate in her lifetime, for which payment was not made, the plaintiff in the present case previously sued Mr. Benari, in his representative capacity, in Massachusetts. In that suit, in the superior court in Suffolk county, she recovered judgment against the estate of the decedent. That judgment remaining largely unsatisfied, she brought this action against Benari as administrator in Maine, counting on a claim differing only from that which formed the basis of her case in Massachusetts, in that it gives credit for payments there made on account, since the commencement of the original action. As special matter of defense in bar, supplemental to the general issue, and by way of brief statement under it, the state of Maine administrator invoked the judgment recovered against him as domiciliary administrator in Massachusetts. Plaintiff by counter brief statement replied that the suits were between different parties. Evidence of the Massachusetts judgment was excluded by the trial court, and an exception allowed.

The exclusion of the offered evidence was in accordance with the established doctrine of the courts of this country. Where administrations of the estates of the same intestate are granted to different persons in different states, they are so far deemed independent of each other that a judgment obtained against one will furnish no right of action against the other, to affect assets received by the latter in virtue of his own administration; for in contemplation of law there is no privity between him and the other administrator. Story, Conf. L. § 522; Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. 467, 11 L. ed. 1059; Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. 44, 12 L. ed. 337; Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. 458, 14 L. ed. 223; McLean v. Meek, 18 How. 16, 15 L. ed. 277; Noonan v. Bradley, 9 Wall. 394, 19 L. ed. 757; Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 254, 35 L. ed. 464, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 773; Smith v. Madden (C. C.) 78 Fed. 833; Low v. Bartlett, 8 Allen, 259. As was said by Mr. Justice Virgin in Fowle v. Coe, 63 Me. 245: "The answer is that the administrations of the estates of the same decedents in different states, where there are creditors and property belonging to the same estate, are regarded as wholly independent of each other; . . . that there is no privity between the different administrations, but that each is sovereign within its own limits."

In the case at bar, the fact that one and the same person is administrator in both states does not alter the doctrine. The Massachusetts judgment is against the defendant in his representative capacity there. That representation does not extend beyond the assets of which the Massachusetts court that appointed him has jurisdiction. Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. 44, 12 L. ed. 337. Letters of administration are without extra-territorial force. Story, Conf. L. § 512; Smith v. Guild, 34 Me. 443;

S. 156, at page 159, 35 L. ed. 112, 113, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, Mr. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "A judgment recovered against the administrator of a deceased person in one state is no evidence of debt, in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff in another state, either against an administrator, whether the same or a different person, appointed there, or against any other person having assets of the deceased."

In Stacy v. Thrasher, supra, a judgment recovered in one state, on an alleged debt of the intestate, was held to be incompetent evidence of the debt in a suit brought by the same plaintiff in the circuit court of the United States, held within another state, against an administrator there appointed of the same intestate. In that case it was urged, as here, that the principle indicated was not applicable because of the provision of the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1. In speaking the speech of the court, Mr. Justice Grier said: "The judgment is against the person of the administrator, that he shall pay the debt of the intestate out of the funds committed to his care. If there be another administrator in another state liable to pay the same debt, he may be subject to a like judgment upon the same demand; but the assets in his hands cannot be affected by a judgment to which he is personally a stranger. . . . The laws and courts of a state can only affect persons and things within their jurisdiction. Consequently, both as to the administrator and the property confided to him, a judgment in another state is res inter alios acta."

The ruling of the trial court was right.

Exceptions overruled.

In Stacy v. Thrasher (1848) 6 How. (U. S.) 44, 12 L. ed. 337, supra, the court said of administrators in different states: "Each is privy to the testator, and would be estopped by a judgment against him; but they have no privity with each other, in law or in estate. They receive their authority from different sovereignties, and over different property. The authority of each is paramount to the other. Each is accountable to the ordinary from whom he receives his authority."

In Ingersoll v. Coram (1903) 127 Fed. 418, the court said: "The law is settled beyond question that an ancillary administrator in one jurisdiction is not in privity with an ancillary administrator in another jurisdiction; so that no judgment by or against Harris as ancillary administrator in Montana could avail for or against an ancillary administrator appointed by the courts of Massachusetts, bringing a suit in that state or in this district, although the cause of action was identically the same."

In McGarvey v. Darnall (1890) 134 Ill. 367, 10 L.R.A. 861, 25 N. E. 1005, supra, the court said: "The doctrine is well settled that, if letters of administration are granted in different states to different persons, in respect to estate left by the same deceased person, there is no privity between such administrators, and that therefore a judgment against the administrator in one state is not competent testimony to show a right of action against either a domiciliary or ancillary administrator in another state, or to affect assets in such other state."

In Story on Conflict of Laws, it is said (§ 522): "Where administrations are granted to different persons in different states, they are so far deemed independent of each other that a judgment obtained against one will furnish no right of action against the other, to affect assets received by the latter in virtue of his own administration; for in contemplation of law there is no privity between him and the other administrator. It might be different if the same person were administrator in both states."

In Tighe v. Tighe (1877) Ir. Rep. 11 Eq. 203, it was held that a Cape Colony judgment against the administrators (called executors dative) of a decedent, there appointed, afforded no support to a claim in Ireland against an administrator there appointed. Counsel stated that, as regarded English or Irish authorities, the question was one of first impression. The court followed Story, Conf. L. § 522.

The rule applies, although the same person is the administrator appointed in both jurisdictions. Johnson v. Powers (1891) 139 U. S. 156, 35 L. ed. 112, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525 (obiter); Johnston v. McKinnon (1910) 129 Ala. 223, 29 So. 696; NASH v. BENARI (reported herewith) ante, 61; Strauss v. Phillips (1901) 189 Ill. 21, 59 N. E. 560; State use of Bank of Wayne v. Fulton (1898) — Tenn. —, 49 S. W. 297.

But, in Lomas v. Hilliard (1880) 60 N. H. 148, in holding that a Vermont judgment rejecting a claim against the estate of an intestate of Vermont was a bar to the claim in New Hampshire, the same persons being the administrators in both states, the court said: "If judgment had been rendered against the intestate previous to his death by a competent tribunal in another state, after a full and fair trial, there would be no doubt that his administrator in this state would be bound by it; and there seems to be no sound reason why, if the judgment had been rendered against his representative instead of him, the same representative would not be bound by it. He is, to be sure, the administrator and representative in Vermont by virtue of Vermont law, and in New Hampshire by virtue of New Hampshire law; but that distinction does not annihilate his identity. He is the same person in one state as in the other, and represents the same interests. He exercises his own individual judgment in both states in behalf of the same estate, and to say that an adjudication of a matter concerning the estate in one state, to which he was properly a party, would not be binding on the parties in another state, because he happened to derive his representative character in both states from different sources, is, it seems to us, a technical refinement not often found in modern legal reasoning. It is not suggested that the assets of the estate would be any differently affected in one jurisdiction than in the other, although the proceedings in each state are had primarily with reference to the assets in that state; nor is it apparent how the same administrator could do any more or any less in his defense against the claim in this suit in one state than in the other." And see also Creighton v. Murphy (1879) 8 Neb. 349, 1 N. W. 138, infra. See also the doubt expressed in Story, Conf. L. § 522, supra.

That the suit resulting in the judgment was commenced in the decedent's lifetime does not alter the case. Stacy v. Thrasher (1848) 6 How. (U. S.) 44, 12 L. ed. 337; First Nat. Bank v. Dowdy (1913) 175 Mo. App. 478, 161 S. W. 859; Braithwaite v. Harvey (1894) 14 Mont. 208, 27 L.R.A. 101, 43 Am. St. Rep. 625, 36 Pac. 38; King v. Clarke (1837) 2 Hill, Eq. (S. C.) 611; Carriagan v. Semple (1888) 72 Tex. 306, 12 S. W. 178.

But the contrary was held in Creighton v. Murphy (1879) 8 Neb. 349, 1 N. W. 138, where a resident of Nebraska died pending an action against him in Iowa; administration was taken out on his estate in Nebraska, and the same person was appointed administrator in Iowa and appeared in the suit; and it was held that judgment therein against him in Iowa was conclusive upon him as administrator in Nebraska. The court said: "Whatever the rule may be as to judgments recovered against ancillary administrators upon claims filed after the death of the intestate, it cannot affect this case. Here, an action was commenced against Edward Creighton in his lifetime, and personal service was had on him, and he appeared and filed an answer to the petition, denying the facts stated therein. He died before the trial, but the cause of action survived. Had the court not authority, upon the appointment of an administrator and the revivor of the action, to proceed with the case and render judgment? We think it had. The court had acquired jurisdiction, and the death of the defendant did not oust it of that jurisdiction. The court therefore had authority to revive the action against the administrator and to hear and determine the rights of the parties, and such judgment is conclusive as to the matters in issue. To require a plaintiff, who has established his claim after a tedious and expensive litigation in Iowa, to go through the same process in this state, would impose a burden upon him not required by the law."

Thus, a judgment of the state of his appointment against a domiciliary administrator affords no basis for an action in another state against an administrator there appointed. McLean v. Meek (1855) 18 How. (U. S.) 16, 15 L. ed. 277; McGarvey v. Darnall (1890) 134 Ill. 367, 10 L.R.A. 861, 25 N. E. 1005; Smith v. Goodrich (1897) 167 Ill. 46, 47 N. E. 316; Strauss v. Phillips (1901) 189 Ill. 21, 59 N. E. 560; Creswell v. Slack (1885) 68 Iowa, 110, 26 N. W. 42; NASH v. BENARI (reported herewith) ante, 61.

But in Price v. Mace (1879) 47 Wis. 23, 1 N. W. 336, the court said (obiter): "It seems hard to drive creditors, who had fairly litigated their claims against the principal administrator, to litigate them de novo against the ancillary administrator. Whether and how far judgments against the principal administrator, accompanied by proof that there are no assets in his hands to satisfy them, should be evidence in a court which had granted ancillary letters, might, perhaps, be regarded as a question not absolutely settled by the authorities. They leave such an effect of such judgments, however, in very great doubt."

In holding that a record of the domiciliary probate court, allowing a claim of the local administrator, was not evidence in a court of another state against persons alleged to hold there real estate of the decedent, under conveyance alleged to have been made by him in fraud of his creditors, the court said: "A judgment recovered against the administrator of a deceased person in one state is no evidence of debt, in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff in another state, either against an administrator, whether the same or a different person, appointed there, or against any other person having assets of the deceased." Johnson v. Powers (1890) 139 U. S. 156, 35 L. ed. 112, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525 (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

The rule is particularly applicable where the only property in the second jurisdiction is real estate. Sargent v. Davis (1848) 3 La. Ann. 353.

In Carrigan v. Semple (1888) 72 Tex. 306, 12 S. W. 178, it was held that a judgment against an administrator in the state of the decedent's domicil, and where the administrator was appointed, is no basis for a suit in another state against another administrator there appointed, in the absence of a showing that the local administrator had assets in his hands which were ever assets in the hands of the first-mentioned administrator.

But it may be noted that in Moore v. Fields (1862) 42 Pa. 467, administrators appointed at the domicil in New York, who were dismissed and an account there stated against them, showing a balance which they were decreed to pay to their successor, were held liable to such successor, in a suit on such decree in Pennsylvania, where no letters had been taken.

c. Judgment elsewhere.

So, a judgment in another state against an administrator there appointed affords no basis for an action in the state of principal administration, against the administrator appointed there. Stacy v. Thrasher (1848) 6 How. 44, 12 L. ed. 337 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Turner v. Risor (1890) 54 Ark. 33, 15 S. W. 13 (obiter); Johnston v. McKinnon (1900) 129 Ala. 223, 29 So. 696; First Nat. Bank v. Dowdy (1913) 175 Mo. App. 473, 161 S. W. 859; Braithwaite v. Harvey (1894) 14 Mont. 208,

In Commercial Bank v. Slater (1874) 21 Minn. 174, the refusal to permit a suit against the administrator of the domicil, on a judgment recovered in another state against the administrator there appointed, was on the ground that the case was excluded by the Minnesota statute, which excluded all suits against an executor or administrator except those expressly provided for by the statute.

It may be noted that in Jones v. Jones (1855) 15 Tex. 463, 65 Am. Dec. 174, it was held that a Missouri judgment against an ancillary administrator there appointed affords no basis for a suit in Texas against the heirs or distributees, it not being alleged that any property had come to their hands which were assets in Missouri, although the Missouri suit was begun against the decedent. The court states that the judgment "gave no right of action against the administrator or the heirs in this state," but it does not appear that the administrator was a party.

II. Where there is an executor.

a. Different executors in the two jurisdictions.

A judgment against one of several executors in another jurisdiction was held admissible against another executor of the same testator in Louisiana, "for the purpose of showing that the demand had been carried into judgment in another jurisdiction, against one of the testator's executors, and that the others were precluded by it from pleading prescription or the Statute of Limitations upon the original cause of action." Hill v. Tucker (1851) 13 How. (U. S.) 458, 14 L. ed. 223; Goodall v. Tucker, 1851, 13 How. (U. S.) 469, 14 L. ed. 227 (see also Rose's Notes to these cases).

In Hill v. Tucker (U. S.) supra, the court said: "Though the executor's trust or appointment may be limited, or though there are several executors in different jurisdictions, and some of them limited executors, they are, as to the creditors of the testators, executors in privity, bearing to the creditors the same responsibilities as if there was only one executor. The privity arises from their obligations to pay the testator's debts, wherever his effects may be, just as his obligation was to pay them. The executor's interest in the testator's estate is derived from the will, and vests from the latter's death, whatever may be the form which the law requires to be observed before an executor enters upon the discharge of his functions.

. . . All of them, then, having the same privity with each other and to the testator, and the same responsibility to creditors, though they may have been qualified as executors in different sovereignties, an action for a debt due by the testator, against any one of them in that sovereignty where he undertook to act as executor, places all of them in one relation concerning it; and, as to the remedies for its recovery, what one may plead to bar a recovery, another may plead, and that which will not bar a recovery against any of them applies to all of them.

. . . Notwithstanding the privity that there is between executors to a testator, we do not think that a judgment obtained against one of several executors would be conclusive as to the demand against another executor, qualified in a different state from that in which the judgment was rendered."

b. Judgment against executor who has qualified in both jurisdictions.

A judgment of a state court in favor of a creditor against an executrix, for the recovery of moneys against the estate, the parties being citizens of the state which was the domicile of the testator, and the court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, is conclusive against the executrix in another state, in which she afterwards takes out letters testamentary, in a suit between the same parties for the same purpose. Carpenter v. Strange (1890) 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960, where the court said: "She was in privity with the decedent as to his property by the terms of the will, and the judgment against her as executrix in New York bound her in Tennessee, upon the probate of the will and her qualification there."

In Turley v. Dreyfus (1883) 35 La. Ann. 510, it was held that "a judgment against the sole testamentary executor of a deceased person, who had qualified and was administering in that capacity in both Tennessee and Louisiana, rendered by a court of Tennessee, was binding on him in his capacity as testamentary executor in both states," that "the case was not affected by the death of the executor during the pendency of an appeal in the supreme court of Tennessee, and by the substitution of an administrator de bonis non contradictorily with whom the appeal was necessarily prosecuted," and that the judgment would support an action in Louisiana against such administrator, called dative testamentary executor.

In holding that a New Jersey executrix who had taken out ancillary letters testamentary in New York ought not to defeat a suit on the ground that a judgment against her would be ineffective, the court, while not determining the force of the judgment, said: "While we are not required for present purposes to decide upon its legitimate force and effect, and that question should be left until it arises, it is enough to say that the judgment may avail the plaintiff in two directions, even if it were certain that he could not reach assets here. If he should be driven to the forum of original probate jurisdiction, the case of Hill v. Tucker, 18 How. (U. S.) 458, 14 L. ed. 223, indicates that the judgment would be, at least, prima facie evidence of the indebtedness, and, if not conclusive, would at least bar the Statute of Limitations, which otherwise might apply." Hopper v. Hopper (1891) 125 N. Y. 400, 12 L.R.A. 237, 26 N. E. 457.

In White v. Archbill (1855) 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 588, holding that a judgment against an executor recovered in North Carolina, where he did not plead "fully administered," or no assets, was cause for a recovery thereon against him de bonis propriis in Tennessee, it seems probable that the executor was appointed in North Carolina, and that no letters were granted in Tennessee.

But the judgment of removal of an executor by the court of the domicil of his testatrix is not conclusive upon the court of another state, which has admitted the will and granted letters to him. American Missionary Asso. v. Hall (1904) 138 Mich. 247, 101 N. W. 585.

It may be noted that a judgment in a state court against an executrix, declaring a deed from the testator to her of land in another state void as to a debt due from the testator to the plaintiff, but not directing a conveyance of the land, does not annul the title to the land, and is not binding upon the courts of the other state, so far as to compel them to surrender jurisdiction over the land, which is exclusively subject to the laws and jurisdiction of the courts of the latter state. Carpenter v. Strange (1890) 141 U. S. 87, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960, supra (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

The cases of this nature are not in harmony.

In Latine v. Clements (1847) 3 Ga. 426, it was held that one who has recovered a judgment against an executor appointed at the forum may recover on the judgment in Georgia against an administrator with the will annexed, there appointed.

In Baldwin v. Rice (1904) 44 Misc. 64, 89 N. Y. Supp. 738, it was held that a judgment in a suit begun in Texas against a husband, by the executor of his wife's estate there appointed, and after his death settled with his administrator appointed in Texas, is binding in New York against any representative of the wife's estate thereafter appointed in New York; but the decision of this question was not necessary to the result, and the judgment was modified on appeal by excluding the decision of this question (1905) 100 App. Div. 241, 91 N. Y. Supp. 1086, affirmed in (1905) 133 N. Y. 55, 75 N. E. 1096, which has reargument denied in (1906) 184 N. Y. 523, 76 N. E. 1088.

On the other hand, it was held in Richards v. Blaisdell (1909) 12 Cal. App. 101, 106 Pac. 732, that a judgment or allowance of claims against an executor in the state of his appointment affords no basis for a suit in another state against an administrator with the will annexed, appointed therein, nor is it evidence to establish the indebtedness, even if the California statute did not cover the matter. The court reviews the cases, considers Hilton v. Tucker (1851) 18 How. (U. S.) 458, 14 L. ed. 223, supra, and Low v. Bartlett (1864) 8 Allen (Mass.) 259 (infra, d), to be in harmony with its view, and states, inter alia: "The administration, though called ancillary to distinguish it from the administration of the last residence of the decedent, is wholly independent of it. . . . Considering the effect of § 1913, Code of Civil Procedure, upon the judgment of the Minnesota court, in the light of the rule declared by the cases above reviewed, if it be held that the exception therein as to executors and administrators has no bearing, we are still of the opinion that the judgment is not only not conclusive upon the California administrator with the will annexed, but that it cannot be the basis of an action against him, or even evidence to establish the indebtedness. This is the result, whether we accept the implied view of some of the cases that a proceeding to establish a claim against an estate is a proceeding in rem, having for its res the assets of the estate within the jurisdiction where presented, as distinguished from the entire estate, or the theory of the United States Supreme Court, that an action to establish a claim is in personam against the executor or administrator in the jurisdiction in which brought, which can be made payable only out of the assets of the estate in that jurisdiction."

A judgment in Ohio against an Ohio executor and, in the language of the judgment, to be paid there in due course of administration, is improperly allowed by an Illinois court as a claim against an administrator with

A judgment against an ancillary administrator in the state of his appointment is not evidence against the executor at the chief place of administration. Low v. Bartlett (1864) 8 Allen (Mass.) 259, where the court said, inter alia: "It is said that they are in privity with the testator, and that this creates a privity of estate between them. It is true that the executor is in privity with the testator in respect to the estate which he takes, which is merely the estate in Massachusetts, and within the jurisdiction of its courts; and the administrator is in privity with him in respect to the estate in Vermont, which he can administer upon. But as the privity relates to different property and different matters, and is limited to different jurisdictions, it does not aid the plaintiff. There is no privity between the estate in the hands of the executor and that in the hands of the administrator. Each must be administered separately and independently. . . . Another and a decisive objection to the plaintiff's position is, that if it were held to be valid, it would enable the foreign administrator to bind the estate in Massachusetts, by suffering the recovery of a judgment against him."

Where a nonresident defendant died during an arbitration, in an action which was continued to a decree against his administrator with the will annexed, appointed by the court of the forum, such decree was held to be of no effect upon the executors of the domicile of the deceased, although the stipulation for submission to arbitration provided that the arbitration should continue in case of the death of either party, and that his successors and legal representatives should be bound by the final award. Brown v. Fletcher (1908) 210 U. S. 82, 52 L. ed. 966, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702, affirming (1906) 146 Mich. 401, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 632, 123 Am. St. Rep. 233, 109 N. W. 686. In this case the Michigan court said: "Whatever may be the relations of two or more coexecutors, residing in different states, in each of which states the testator left property, and whatever the liability of a sole executor, who, for the purpose of administering the estate, secures his own appointment in a state other than that having primary probate jurisdiction, to admit in every jurisdiction the force and validity of a judgment properly pronounced against him in any jurisdiction, it is clear that the domiciliary executor and the estate in the state of decedent's domicile cannot be affected by the acts of a foreign administrator, or by any judgment or decree rendered against such foreign administrator in the state of his appointment. And the case is not changed because the suit in which the judgment is rendered against the foreign administrator was pending in the foreign jurisdiction at the time of the death of the testator."

In Ela v. Edwards (1866) 13 Allen (Mass.) 48, 90 Am. Dec. 174, where an executor of a Massachusetts estate took out ancillary administration in New Hampshire, and procured an allowance by the court thereof of a claim of his own against the estate, it was held that such allowance was not binding on the Massachusetts court.

In Cherry v. Speight (1866) 28 Tex. 503, the court stated that a judgment in Mississippi against a Mississippi administrator was no foundation for a suit in Texas against the executor of the decedent (apparently there appointed), where it was not alleged that any assets which were in the hands of such administrator had come to the possession of such executor.

But, on the other hand, it was held in Tait v. Lewis (1844) 7 Rob. (La.) 206, that where a defendant died during the pendency of an action against him in Virginia, and judgment was taken against his administrator there appointed, that this judgment was prima facie evidence in Louisiana against the executor of decedent appointed in Louisiana, and was sufficient to justify a judgment by default against such executor.

A New York secured creditor of an Illinois estate, presenting its claim there, is bound by the decision of the Illinois court as to the rate of interest, in a suit by the Illinois executor in the Federal court in New York, where he has taken out ancillary letters. Owsley v. Central Trust Co. (1912) 196 Fed. 412.

The will of G., of Virginia, was there probated, and was also probated in Mississippi; letters of administration c. t. a. were granted in Virginia to S., and in Mississippi to B., who later died, leaving a will probated in Mississippi, where W. took letters as executor, and accounted in the chancery court in Mississippi for his testator as administrator c. t. a. of G., S., the said Virginia administrator of G. appearing in the suit. It was held that the Mississippi decree in this suit in favor of the Virginia administrator of G. was enforceable in Virginia against the administrator c. t. a. there appointed, of the estate of B. Garland v. Garland (1887) 84 Va. 181, 4 S. E. 334.

Reference may be here permitted to the following case: A purchaser at an administrator's sale in North Carolina gave bond with sureties; later the same administrator proved the will, took letters as executor, and thereafter sued the principal at law on the bond in Georgia and got judgment, and, pending an appeal, the principal sued the executor in equity, in Georgia, and got judgment against him, to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to a share of the estate in right of his wife, and was, therefore, entitled to a set-off, and that the bond was satisfied, and the executor was enjoined from prosecuting the executor at law.

It was held that the Georgia judgment was no defense to the sureties, in an action by the executor against them in North Carolina. Edney v. Edney (1858) 57 N. C. (4 Jones, Eq.) 127.

III. Miscellaneous.

Where a judgment was recovered against an administrator in a court, whose judgment was no evidence that there were any assets in his hands, it was held that no suit on the judgment would lie against him in another state, where he was sued as one of the administrators appointed therein. Coates v. Mackey (1881) 56 Md. 416.

A woman residing in Illinois died leaving property and creditors in Arkansas, and an administrator there appointed recovered there a judgment against the decedent's husband, who later took letters in Illinois. It was held that the Arkansas administrator might sue the husband in Illinois on the judgment. Moore v. Kraft (1910) 103 C. C. A. 231, 179 Fed. 635.

A court of one state has no power to revoke the letters granted to an administrator in another state (Chapman v. Fish (1844) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 554), nor may it remove an executor appointed in another state (Tillman v. Walkup (1876) 7 S. C. 60).

In the interesting case of Gilman v. Healy (1887) 46 Hun, 310, 11 N. Y. Supp. 517, it does not appear that the decision rested on the fact that the judgments concerned were rendered in another state.

Moore v. Smith (1895) 116 N. C. 667, 21 S. E. 506, probably decided a question of interest on this subject, but, as it does not appear whether any letters were taken out in the foreign jurisdiction, the question decided is not clear.

OSCAR H. CARLSON et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
WILLIAM RENSINK et al.

Fraud — relief — cancelation of note.

1. A note given as boot upon an exchange of real estate may be canceled in an action for damages for fraud in misrepresenting the value of the property, where the defendant is insolvent and has concealed his property in fraud of creditors and placed it beyond his power to restore the property received, so that an action for damages is the only remedy open.

Venue — change — action for fraud.

2. The venue of an action for damages for fraud in the exchanging of real estate which is brought in the county where all parties reside cannot be changed to the county where the land is located which is the subject of the fraud.

Bills and notes — innocent purchaser — overdue.

3. One purchasing a note when it is long overdue cannot claim immunity as an innocent purchaser for value.

[See 3 R. C. L. 1045.]

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for alleged fraud and deceit of one of the defendants in an exchange of property, and for the cancelation of a note and trust deed given in the exchange of certain property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry Howard, Jr., for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. John D. Milliken, for defendants in error:

The application for change of venue was properly denied.

Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Cahill, 8 Colo. App. 163, 45 Pac. 285.

There is no evidence that plaintiffs had any means of knowledge except that imparted to them by defendant Carlson, and they had a right to rely upon his statement.

If the cancelation of the note and trust deed was error, it is error without prejudice to Oscar H. Carlson, and he cannot complain.

Springhetti v. Hahnwald, 54 Colo. 383, 131 Pac. 266.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged fraud and deceit of Oscar H. Carlson, one of the defendants, in a transaction involving an exchange of ranch property owned by him for Denver city property owned by William and Johanna Rensink, plaintiffs, and for the cancelation of a note and trust deed for $500 in favor of defendant, Hulda M. Carlson, Oscar's wife, given in the exchange of properties. That note was, after maturity, transferred to the other defendant, Anderson. The jury returned special findings to the effect that defendant Carlson showed plaintiffs other and different land than the tract owned by him, which was to be exchanged, with an intent to deceive and mislead them; that the land shown by Carlson was worth $20 more per acre than the land which he actually owned and proposed to trade; that the other defendants knowingly and deliberately participated in the deception, and that the note in question was taken by Anderson to aid in the consummation of the fraud. That the moving cause of the deal was the false and fraudulent representations of Oscar.

Upon such findings the court entered judgment against Carlson in damages for the sum of $1,410. The note and trust deed were ordered canceled, and the amount of the note deducted from the judgment, reducing same to $910, in default of payment of which Carlson was ordered confined in the county jail for a period not to exceed four months. Defendant Anderson had foreclosed the deed of trust, and the certificate of purchase under the foreclosure was decreed to be the property of plaintiffs. Defendants bring the cause here for review.

Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to grant a change of venue to Arapahoe county for the reason that the land owned by Carlson and exchanged through the alleged fraud was situated in that county. The theory of defendants is that if a tort was committed it was committed in that county. The residence property exchanged by plaintiffs for the land is in the city and county of Denver. Both plaintiffs and all the defendants, at the time of the transaction, resided in the latter county, and did so reside when this action was brought, and service of process was had therein.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Cahill, 8 Colo. App. 162, 45 Pac. 286, the following rule is announced: "In an action for a tort, which, is this case, the county where the defendant resides, and the county where the plaintiff resides and the defendant is served, and the county where the tort was committed, are equally proper counties for trial; and if the action is commenced in any one of these counties, the place of trial cannot be changed on the ground that the county designated is not the proper county."

action for fraud.

Under this decision it was not error to deny the application for a change of venue.

It is urged that there was no evidence to warrant the cancelation of the note and trust deed in the hands of defendant Anderson. It appears that he got the note more than two years after it became due, and that he traded "some other old and overdue paper" for it. The jury found that he secured the note as a part of the plan to defraud plaintiffs. In any event he took the note when it was long overdue and cannot, therefore, claim immunity as an innocent purchaser for value. Manifestly the judgment of the district court should not be disturbed upon this contention.

innocent purchaser—overdue.

The cancelation of the note is also objected to for the reason that the cause of action is in damages, and such cancelation amounts to at least a partial rescission of the contract, and was therefore erroneously decreed.

It was alleged, and the testimony supports the claim, that Carlson was insolvent and had concealed his property in fraud of creditors; that the real estate conveyed to his wife, Hulda, by plaintiffs had been transferred and that it was beyond Carlson's power to restore it. And, further, that rescission had been made impossible by the acts of the defendants themselves. In such circumstances plaintiffs could not elect as to remedy. They had but one, which was for damages. The cancellation of the note involves rather a question of relief than of remedy. There is but one remedy. The relief is twofold. Directing the cancellation of the note was merely a practical way, in view of the circumstances of the case, of applying relief under the only remedy that plaintiffs had. Damages had been cancellation of

fixed at $1,410, from which was deducted the face value of the outstanding $500 note. It would be absurd to hold that this could not be properly done. This is not a judgment for both rescission and damages, nor an improper joinder of causes. It is simply an instance, such as is discussed in Mullen v. McKim, 22 Colo. 474, 45 Pac. 416, where this court, after quoting with approval from § 171 of Bliss on Code Pleadings, proceeds as follows: "In such cases, as is well stated by Professor Bliss, in seeking what is still called legal and equitable relief, or different kinds of relief, the plaintiff really does not unite different causes of action, for there is but one. He only seeks the twofold relief for the one wrong."

In Marple v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 115 Minn. 262, 132 N. W. 333, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1082, plaintiff brought action for damages after having accepted a sum of money from the railway company under contract of settlement. The amount so received was not tendered back to the company, but was deducted from the damages awarded. In discussing this phase of the case the court said: "There are many cases in other states which hold . . . that substantial justice is secured and the spirit of the rule followed where no return or offer to return is made in the pleadings, but where the money received on the settlement is deducted from the amount of the recovery, in case there be a recovery for a greater sum. Some cases hold this on the ground that, where plaintiff was entitled to the money irrespective of the contract, it is inequitable that he should be required to pay it back as a condition of rescission; others, on the ground that equity will not compel the doing of a useless act, and will not permit a mere technicality to defeat justice. But the real ground of all the cases, we think, is that there is no reason for the strict application of the rule when substantial justice can be meted out in the final disposition of the case."

It appears that the judgment rendered is just, and that the cancellation of the note in effect amounts to no more or less than a partial liquidation of the damages awarded plaintiffs.

The instructions given fairly and correctly state the law of the case, and the assignments of error based upon a refusal to give instructions tendered by defendants are not well taken. The other assignments not specifically referred to are also without merit.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Relief as regards outstanding money obligation in action for damages for fraud in inducing contract.

The right in an action in damages for fraud, to the relief granted the plaintiff in the reported case (CARLSON v. RENSINK, ante, 72) by way of canceling the note given by him to the defendant, has not been raised in many cases. There are cases, however, in which such relief has been granted. In Barbour v. Flick (1899) 126 Cal. 628, 59 Pac. 122, an action in damages based upon fraud and deceit in the exchange of real property, the plaintiff was found to be damaged to the extent of $15,000, and, as part of the recovery and remedy in the action, the plaintiff was held entitled to have his note and mortgage to the defendant for $13,000 canceled and delivered out to the clerk, and to have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $2,000 and costs. In answer to the objection that this was an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to rescind in part, and that partial rescission cannot be had, the court states that this is not an attempt to rescind in part, but that the plaintiff merely asks that the note and mortgage be canceled as a part of his recovery of damage against the defendant, and that, "if an action had been brought by the defendant to foreclose the mortgage, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to a cancellation of the mortgage and note on the same showing as a defense, as appears in their favor in the present action. There is in this state but one form of civil actions for the enforcement or prevention of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrong." Accordingly, the relief granted was sustained. In Montgomery v. McLaury (1904) 143 Cal. 83, 76 Pac. 964, where the action was of an ambiguous character, the court said: "This is not a mere action for money damages—the only relief which a court of law can afford. It is an action to obtain, among other things, a decree canceling the mortgage on the Riverside land [the land purchased],—a species of relief which only a court of equity can afford,—and therefore it is the very case described in the caption to the findings of the court, viz.: 'A Case for Equitable Relief against Defendant for Fraudulent Exchange of Lands.'" And the court concludes that "in this case a part of the price by the respondents for the Riverside land was a note secured by a mortgage of that very land. If this note was for less than the sum in which they were defrauded by defendants in the exchange, they were entitled to have it and the mortgage canceled, as well as damages sufficient to fully compensate the injury. And it was proper, in order to avoid circuity of action, to seek all the relief appropriate to the case in one action."

The right of equity, in an action to have a land sale rescinded and the securities given for the purchase money delivered up and canceled, to assess damages on account of the fraud, and give complete relief to the plaintiff, was sustained in Carroll v. Rice (1844) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 373.

APPEAL by the state from an order of the Judicial District Court for Elko County sustaining a demurrer to an information charging defendant with unlawfully having in his possession a heifer's hide, from which the ears had been removed in violation of statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. P. Carville, Charles A. Cantwell, George B. Thatcher, Attorney General, Edward T. Patrick, and William McKnight, for the State:

The act in question is not unconstitutional.

State v. Brooken, L.R.A.1915B, 213, and note, 19 N. M. 404, 143 Pac. 479, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 136; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53; 8 Cyc. 863.

Messrs. Curler & Castle for respondent.

Ducker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An information was filed against the respondent by the district attorney of Elko county under § 375½ of an act of the legislature of this state, entitled "An act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act Concerning Crimes and Punishments, and Repealing Certain Acts Relating Thereto,' Approved March 17, 1911, and Adding Another Section Thereto, to be Numbered 375½," approved March 15, 1915. Stat. 1915, p. 155.

The act which consists solely of said § 375½ reads: "It shall be unlawful for any person to have in his possession any hide of any cow, bull, steer, calf or heifer, from which hide the ears have been removed . . . or the brand obliterated, defaced, or disfigured so that same cannot be readily recognized, and any person having such hide in his possession shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for any term not less than one year nor more than five years."

The information charges that the defendant, on the 3d day of June, A. D. 1917, or thereabouts, and before the filing of this information, at the county of Elko, state of Nevada, did then and there wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have in his possession a hide of a heifer, from which said hide the ears had been removed, all of which is contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the state of Nevada.

A demurrer was interposed to the information upon the grounds:

First, that the facts stated in said information do not constitute a public offense; and

Second, that the facts stated in said information do not constitute a public offense in this, that the act of the legislature, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act Concerning Crimes and Punishments, and Repealing Certain Acts Relating Thereto,' Approved March 17, 1911, and Adding Another Section Thereto, to be Numbered 375½," is unconstitutional and void.

The district court sustained this demurrer and made an order allowing the respondent to go without bail and releasing the sureties on his bail bond from further liability.

From this order sustaining the demurrer, the state appeals. The constitutionality of the act of the legislature under which the information is drawn is thus before this court for determination.

Respondent insists that this act comes in conflict with § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

He asserts that the statute goes beyond the legitimate bounds of the police power of the state. He contends that the law is invalid in this respect, because it unnecessarily restricts the use of property in hides of live stock in this state to such an extent as to destroy its value for any practical use, and therefore deprives him of his property without due process of law.

There is no ground for dissent from the conclusion that in this enactment the evil sought to be reached is the larceny of cattle. Its purpose is obvious from the wording of the statute and the conditions prevailing in this state. The business of raising cattle is one of the principal industries of the state, and has to do with property of a kind commonly subject to the crime of larceny. Its value, the ease with which it can be moved from one locality to another, and its identity, destroyed by killing and skinning the animal, or by changing, mutilating, or removing the marks and brands, furnish the inducement for thieves. Particularly is the larceny of cattle a common crime in Nevada, where, as in other grazing states, large numbers of stock wander over wide expanses of range lands, unkept by herdsmen, and often unseen by the owner or his agents for long periods of time during the grazing season of the year.

These range conditions create favorable opportunities for the theft of cattle, as detection is difficult and often impossible, and the loss to stockmen is increased by the resultant acts of larceny.

When a stolen animal is killed it loses all marks of identity as soon as the hide bearing the earmarks and brand is removed. The legislature, recognizing these conditions and the difficulty that generally follows in proving identity and ownership, passed the enactment under consideration for the purpose of supplementing the law of larceny of cattle.

That the statute is extremely drastic in its provisions cannot be denied. Acts theretofore generally innocent and properly and usefully exercised over property in hides of cattle have been declared to be a felony, and punishment prescribed. The mere possession of the hide of any cow, etc., with the ears or brand removed or changed as described in the statute, property inherently harmless and a valuable product of the cattle-raising business, is made a felony. There are no exceptions made or guilty intent required. The owner and the thief are placed in the same class by possession of the proscribed hide.

Statutes—

While we may consider the statute unjust and oppressive in these respects we may not for such reasons declare it invalid.

—interference
rights.

But a statute enacted for the prevention of a public offense which the legislature deems essential to declare to promote the public good must be reasonably adapted to attain that end, without unnecessarily invading personal or property rights, before it can be held a valid exercise of the police power. The statement of a rule which has been sanctioned by the weight of authority, and which appeals to us as a clear and logical expression of the elements to be weighed in reaching a correct conclusion as to the limits of the police power, is stated in 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 938: "In order that a statute or ordinance may be sustained as an exercise of the police power, the courts must be able to see that the enactment has for its object the prevention of some offense or manifest evil, or the preservation of the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, and that there is some clear, real, and substantial connection between the assumed purpose of the enactment and the actual provisions thereof, and that the latter do in some plain, appreciable, and appropriate manner tend towards the accomplishment of the object for which the power is exercised."

police power.

The purpose of the enactment may be conceded to be the prevention of the larceny of cattle, and there is a plain, substantial relation between its provisions and the object sought to be attained. But the effectiveness of the act, that is, the extent to which its provisions are designed to accomplish its purpose, when closely scanned, is doubtful. And while the court may not substitute its judgment for the very extensive discretion of the lawmaking body in this regard, except in doubtful

cases where it is plainly apparent that an act is non-effective, we may weigh this doubtful element in connection with the interdiction which, we believe, the act lays upon the use and enjoyment of private property.

Counsel insists that the provisions of the act will put an end to the killing of cattle in this state and the subsequent mutilation of hides to prevent identification by forcing thieves either to preserve the evidence of their larceny or force them to do entirely away with the hides, thus furnishing evidence of their guilt. But it seems quite as reasonable to conclude that the act, instead of causing larcenies of this character to be abandoned or diminished to any great extent, would persuade the thief to choose the lesser of the three incriminating circumstances stated, and destroy the hide.

A thief as a rule does not intentionally retain evidence of the crime in his possession, unless it be the property for which the crime is committed, or means for its commission. Especially is he less liable to do so when such possession is in itself a felony, as this act provides.

Cattle are stolen for the value of the carcass, and not for the hides, which sometimes contain marks of identification other than the artificial ones of earmarks and brands. Consequently, the more effectively the latter are destroyed the less is the risk of detection. The possession of a slaughtered animal without the hide may or may not be some evidence of guilt, depending entirely on other circumstances, but, even so, this is an element of risk always present in larcenies of this kind when such method of destroying evidence is pursued, and is not likely to be avoided because other methods are made felonious.

Does this statute deprive a person of his property without due process of law against the guaranties of § 1, article 14, of the Federal Constitution, and § 8, article 1, of the Constitution of this state? We are of the opinion that it does. True, the statute under consideration does not work an active appropriation of hides from the owner, but it limits their use to an extent that destroys their value.

The inception of private property was in its use, and its value may be said to end there.

its use as by annihilating the substance or structure of the thing itself. 8 R. C. L. pp. 196, 197, and cases there cited.

Hides of cattle constitute property, and are a valuable product of the cattle-raising business, which is one of the principal industries in this state. Rawhide is used in a variety of ways by stockmen and others in making bridle reins and lariats, and in making and repairing various kinds of ranch equipment. Aside from the uses mentioned and which are sometimes crude, it is true, but by no means obsolete in this state, it is used for covering saddle trees, and, when converted into leather, for fully equipping the saddle. When converted into leather by the art of tanning its uses are many and diversified, and the manufacture of leather is a very important industry of the country.

It is clear from the restrictions laid upon hides of the animals mentioned in the statute that they cannot be utilized for any of these purposes in this state without violating its provisions and subjecting the possessor to the penalty of a felony. And it is difficult to perceive how they can be used to obtain any benefit from the product, except by shipping it out of the state, for to devote the hide to any other use whatever would necessarily involve the removal of the ears and mutilation of the brand.

This appears to us to be an unnecessary invasion of property rights, and therefore an unreasonable exertion of the police power. It is not a regulation of the use of property, but a restriction that virtually amounts to a prohibition of its use without effecting proportionate ends conducive to the public welfare. Admittedly the number of hides mutilated for the purpose of evading detection for the crime of larceny are comparatively small to the great volume of hides legitimately taken from cattle, and from which the ears and brands are removed or the latter obliterated that the hide may be converted into articles of trade and used in various other ways. The instances where hides are mutilated are occasional and secret, while the necessity for doing so to devote them to useful purposes in fashioning and manufacturing articles of merchandise is general and universal. But because hides may be disfigured occasionally, to destroy evidence of larceny of cattle, the statute entirely prohibits its the use of hides in this state. To prevent a few from illegal practices the many are deprived of the use of property.

The case at bar must be distinguished from those in which the property proscribed is harmful in its nature or tendency, such as intoxicating liquors, opium, and the like, the use of which, on account of their recognized noxious qualities, may be entirely prohibited. The preservation of the public health and public morals is vitally essential to the health and vigor of the body politic, and by the law of self-preservation embodied in the police power it may destroy anything which tends to undermine them.

Counsel for appellant cite the case of State v. Brooken, 19 N. M. 404, L.R.A.1915B, 213, 143 Pac. 479, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 136. In this case the court held constitutional a statute which makes it a misdemeanor to hold under herd or otherwise interfere with the freedom of calves of neat cattle which are less than seven months old, except such young animals be accompanied with their mothers. The court held that the statute did not violate the state Constitution, securing to all persons the rights of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. The court said: "The act neither denies the right to acquire, possess, nor protect property. It simply provides regulations which, under the peculiar conditions prevailing in this state, must be held reasonable for the exercise and enjoyment of the constitutional guaranties in this regard."

By the New Mexico statute, the owner of calves is not deprived of his property, nor is its use or salability affected in an appreciable way. He is simply required not to hold calves from their mothers until after they have reached a certain age. This is a reasonable regulation under the conditions existing in that state conducive to the larceny of young calves.

The case is easily distinguished from the case before us, wherein the statute considered prevents hides of cattle from being handled in this state at any time in a manner clearly necessary to derive any benefit from them, except such as may be obtained by sending them out of the state.

If the New Mexico statute required hides taken from cattle to be kept intact in some conspicuous place for a certain time, as was provided by a former statute of Nevada repealed by the legislature of 1913, the case of State v. Brooken would be more in point, but it has no application in this case.

We conclude that the act of the legislature of this state, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act Concerning Crimes and Punishments, and Repealing Certain Acts Relating Thereto,' Approved March 17, 1911, and Adding Another Section Thereto, to Be Numbered 375½," approved March 15, 1915, is unconstitutional and void.

The order of the District Court sustaining the demurrer to the information is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute for prevention of larceny of live stock.

It is held in the reported case (PARK v. STATE, ante, 75) that a statute making possession of hides of cattle from which the ears have been removed or the brand defaced, a felony, deprives the owner of his property without due process of law.

In State v. Brooken (1914) 19 N. M. 404, L.R.A. 1915B, 213, 143 Pac. 479, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 136 (referred to in the reported case), it was held that a statute which prevents the holding under herd, or in any inclosure, unaccompanied by their mothers, of any calves of neat cattle under seven months of age, was not violative of any constitutional provision, and was sustainable under the police power, where such regulation appeared reasonably necessary to prevent the larceny of young animals; and that such part of the statute was valid, even if the Constitution were infringed by a later provision of the statute which authorized any inspector appointed by the cattle sanitary board of the state, who should receive notice of the violation of the law, to seize such live stock and sell the same, if ownership be not proved within ten days, he being authorized to do so without obtaining a search warrant, regardless of the fact that, in order to make such seizure, it might be necessary for him to enter upon a citizen's premises and break into buildings and inclosures.

In Lacey v. Lemmons (1916) 22 N. M. 54, L.R.A. 1917A, 1185, 159 Pac. 949, it was held that the portion of the above statute which authorized the seizure and sale of animals under seven months of age, if confined in any of the ways mentioned in the section and unaccompanied by their mothers, and which required no notice, actual or constructive, to the owner, of such seizure and sale, was unconstitutional as authorizing the taking of property without due process of law. The court said: "In cases like the one at bar no controlling necessity exists to seize and sell cattle taken by a cattle inspector. When cattle situated as these were are seized, the claimant or owner should have an opportunity to assert his right thereto, by producing the evidence of their ownership before the cattle inspector, before the same are sold. He should have the right to institute and maintain a suitable action for their recovery, and, as before seen, the statute should require notice to him for that purpose."

In State v. Randolph (1917) 85 Or. 172, 166 Pac. 555, it was held that a statute was constitutional which provided that the brand on an animal is prima facie evidence that the animal belongs to the owner of the brand, provided it has been duly recorded, as provided by law, and that proof of the right of any person to use such brand shall be made by certified copy of the record or by the original certificate, and that parol evidence shall be inadmissible to prove the ownership of a brand. The court said: "The legislature can enact a statute making proof of one fact prima facie evidence of the main fact in issue, and the enactment of such a statute is but the declaration of a rule of evidence; and hence the statute making proof of a recorded brand prima facie evidence that an animal bearing that brand belongs to the owner of the brand is a valid declaration of a rule of evidence, because the statutory evidentiary fact is closely related to and naturally tends to prove the main fact, the ownership of the animal. . . . The state has the power to alter rules of evidence. Stated in general terms, the accepted rule is that a person does not have a vested right in a rule of evidence; and, therefore, the legislature has power to alter or create any rule of evidence so long as it leaves a party a fair opportunity to establish his case or defense, and give in evidence all the facts legitimately bearing on the issues in the cause."

In reversing a conviction for larceny, where the statute provided that "parol evidence shall be inadmissible to prove the ownership of a brand," the court said: "Counsel for the state argue that the statute is absurd if taken in its literal meaning, and that it should be so construed as to permit parol evidence. This contention does not merit consideration, for the reason that the language is plain and unmistakable in its meaning and import, and the court has no authority to say that the legislature did not mean what they have clearly said. The subject is one over which they have plenary power. They might declare that any particular class of evidence shall be inadmissible to establish any particular fact or issue. They may prescribe the modes of proof and the manner of making proof, and the effect such proof shall have in the courts." State v. Dunn (1907) 13 Idaho, 9, 88 Pac. 235.

In Senterfit v. State (1874) 41 Tex. 186, an indictment was dismissed which charged the owner of cattle with driving them out of the county without having a certified copy of the marks and brands, or without having the same properly recorded, but the constitutionality of a statute of this character was not passed on.

In Faith v. State (1869) 32 Tex. 373, the court upheld the constitutionality of a statute which provided that, upon the sale, alienation, or transfer of certain animals therein named, the purchaser shall take a written conveyance descriptive of the animal so purchased or transferred, and, upon the trial of any person so charged with the theft of any animal of this character, the absence of this written conveyance shall be deemed prima facie evidence of "illegal possession." The court considered that, if anything, the statute mitigated the common-law rule, and stated further, "But this circumstance (absence of the written conveyance), resulting from the omission of a plain statutory duty, it seems, might have been given in evidence, even without the act under review."

In Beyman v. Black (1877) 47 Tex. 558, the court sustained the constitutionality of a statute (of 1874) providing for the inspection of cattle about to be driven, or after they had been driven, from a county, with the intention of being slaughtered or sold, with power of seizure, and making it a misdemeanor to sell uninspected hides, or to drive out of the county cattle, etc., uninspected, or to purchase animals or hides without obtaining a bill of sale from the owner, but the principal point of the case was that it did not appear that the statute prevented a purchaser, even though he had disobeyed the statute, from establishing his right to the property seized or slaughtered, if he really was the owner. It was further held that the act was not unconstitutional because its operation was, by its terms, suspended in many counties. A somewhat similar act was sustained in Lastro v. State (1878) 3 Tex. App. 363; and in Walker v. Bowman (1878) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 353.

It may be noted that a statute amending the Texas Penal Code as to thefts of cattle was sustained in Haselmeyer v. State (1877) 1 Tex. App. 690, as not obnoxious to the provisions of the Texas Constitution declaring that every law shall embrace but one subject, which shall be described in its title, and that no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title.

STATE OF NEW MEXICO

v.

A. B. SMITH.

(— N. M. —, 176 Pac. 819.)

Incompetent persons — test of sanity.

1. The test of the question as to whether one about to be executed is sane or insane is whether or not such person, at the time of the examination, from the defects of his faculties, has sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, what he was tried for, the purpose of his punishment, the impending fate which awaits him, and a sufficient understanding to know any fact which might exist which would make his punishment unjust or unlawful, and the intelligence requisite to convey such information to his attorneys or the court. If he has, then he is sane; otherwise, he is insane, and should not be executed.

— writ de lunatico inquirendo — one awaiting trial.

2. Chapter 70, Code 1915, which provides for the issuance by a district judge of a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, to inquire into the lunacy or habitual drunkenness of any person within this state, or having real or personal estate therein, has no application to a person in the custody of the law awaiting execution for a capital offense, or as to a convict undergoing imprisonment for crime. Said statute was enacted solely for the purpose of protecting the civil and property rights of insane persons and habitual drunkards, and for the care of indigent persons by the various counties. Hence, an adjudication by a district court, under such statute, that a person who has been tried and convicted for the crime of murder and sentenced to death is a person of unsound mind, is void, and does not have the effect to stay the execution.

Criminal law — suggestion of insanity — inquiry.

3. The common law forbids the trial, sentencing, or execution of an insane person for a crime while he continues in that state. Where a person has been convicted of a crime and sentenced to death, and, pending the execution, a suggestion is made to the court so passing sentence that the accused has become insane, and the court is satisfied from such suggestion that there is a question as to the sanity of such party, the court will, as a matter of humanity, make such investigation as may be necessary to become informed as to the sanity or insanity of such party.

— stay of execution.

4. The court has the power to grant a stay of execution in such a case for the purpose of enabling it to inquire into the sanity of one about to be executed.

5. The trial of the question of the sanity of a convict, suggested after the verdict and sentence, is, at common law, in the discretion of the judge, without an absolute right on the convict's part to have the issue tried before a court and a jury. In this jurisdiction, there being no statute upon the subject, it is within the province of the court, upon the suggestion of the insanity of one awaiting execution under a death sentence, to adopt such method as to the court seems best suited to enable it to arrive at the truth of the question.

Evidence — sufficiency.

6. Evidence examined, and held, that petitioner is now sane within the rule above stated, and that his execution should not be further stayed.

7. One suffering from delusions upon the subject of water power and hydraulics, and from hallucinations of persecution, is not shown to be so insane that a sentence of death passed upon him should not be carried out, where he has sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, and his impending fate and execution, and understands, knows, and is able to allege any fact that might exist, tending to show that he should not be executed.

PETITION by defendant for a stay of execution of his sentence to death, until he should be restored to his reason, after affirmance of a judgment of the District Court for Dona Ana County convicting him of murder. Stay denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. M. Edwards for petitioner.

Messrs. Harry Patton, Attorney General, and C. A. Hatch, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner A. B. Smith, alias Dashley, was tried and convicted in the district court of Dona Ana county of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to be hanged. He appealed to this court, and on the 15th day of July, 1918, the judgment of the district court was affirmed (State v. Smith, — N. M. —, 174 Pac. 740), and a new judgment was entered in this court, sentencing the petitioner as required by law and directing that the sentence be executed on the 13th day of August, 1918. Thereafter the governor of the state granted said petitioner a reprieve until the 25th day of October, 1918. The petitioner was removed from the jail of Dona Ana county and placed in the state penitentiary at Santa Fe for safe-keeping, and has been confined in the penitentiary continuously since the judgment was entered in the district court of Dona Ana county. On the 10th day of August, 1918, there was issued out of the district court of Santa Fe county a writ de lunatico inquirendo under the provisions of chapter 70, Code 1915, to inquire into the sanity of said Smith, alias Dashley; and upon such inquiry it was adjudged and decreed by judgment of said court that said Smith, alias Dashley, was a person of unsound mind. On the 18th day of October, 1918, petition was filed by said Smith in this court setting up such adjudication, and the further fact that said Smith, alias Dashley, was at such time a person of unsound mind, and asking this court to stay the execution of such sentence of death until said petitioner should be restored to his reason. At the same time this court heard evidence of four physicians as to the sanity or insanity of the petitioner, and the evidence of the warden and assistant warden of the state penitentiary, and, not being advised as to the law in the premises or sufficiently informed as to the facts, an order was entered staying the execution of said sentence until the 29th day of November, 1918. Subsequently a further stay was granted until the 17th day of December, 1918.

At the time of filing the petition, petitioner requested the court to hear evidence and to grant him a stay of execution and further time, in order that he might have the opportunity of taking the depositions of some witnesses in other states as to his alleged insanity. He also filed objections to the court hearing evidence on the question, claiming that the result of the investigation conducted by the district court of Santa Fe county was binding and conclusive upon this court. He further moved, in the event the court decided to conduct an investigation, that he be allowed the right to a jury trial upon the question of his sanity or insanity. On the 25th day of November, 1918, the court heard further evidence upon the question of the alleged insanity of the petitioner, and argument of counsel upon the various questions of law and questions of fact presented.

The first question logically arising for consideration is as to the effect of the adjudication by the district court of Santa Fe county that petitioner was insane at the time of the hearing in said court. In this connection it is, perhaps, advisable to say that at the trial upon the indictment in the district court of Dona Ana county, insanity was not interposed as a defense. The investigation by the district court of Santa Fe county was instituted and conducted under the provisions of chapter 70, Code 1915. The first section (3378) provides: "It shall be lawful for any district judge in this state to issue a commission, in term or vacation time, in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, to inquire into the lunacy or habitual drunkenness of any person within this state, or having real or personal estate therein. Such commission shall issue in the county in which such person, who is alleged to be a lunatic or habitual drunkard, shall be or reside for the time being. If such person shall be absent from the state, the commission shall issue in the county wherein he last had his residence, or in which his property is situated, and shall be executed therein."

Section 3379 provides the form of the commission; § 3380 has to do with the petition upon which the inquiry is instituted; and §§ 3381 to 3386, inclusive, provide the manner of conducting the investigation. The contents of these sections need not be stated, and it is sufficient to say that the hearing was conducted in conformity with the provisions of such sections. Section

3387 reads as follows: "It shall be lawful for the court, after the return of the inquisition as aforesaid, notwithstanding any traverse of the same that may be pending, to make such orders touching the care and custody of the person, and the management and safe-keeping of the estate of any person, so found to be a lunatic or habitual drunkard, as it shall think necessary and proper."

Section 3388 provides for the appointment of a committee. Section 3393 reads as follows: "The committee of said person found to be a lunatic or habitual drunkard, shall have the management and control of his person and estate, and shall from time to time apply so much thereof as may be necessary for support and maintenance of himself and family, and for the education of his minor children."

Section 3406 reads: "Whenever, under a provision of this chapter, a person is found, upon inquisition to be a lunatic or habitual drunkard, and neither himself nor his friends have sufficient personal or real estate for the maintenance of said lunatic or habitual drunkard, he shall be supported at the expense of the county of which he is a resident; but the committee of such poor lunatic or habitual drunkard, shall in all respects conform to the provisions of this chapter."

The remaining sections of the chapter have to do with the management of the estate, reports to the court, etc.

The attorney general contends that this chapter has no application to a person in the custody of the law awaiting execution for a capital offense, or as to a convict undergoing imprisonment for crime, but that it was enacted solely for the purpose of protecting the civil and property rights of insane persons, and for the care of indigent persons by the various counties. The statute was enacted in 1856, long prior to the establishment of the New Mexico Insane Asylum by the legislature in 1889. With this contention of the attorney general we agree. There is nothing in the statute showing that it was intended to have any application whatever to persons in the custody of the law, undergoing confinement or awaiting execution for crimes. To give to it the effect claimed by petitioner would be to create a conflict of jurisdiction over the person of one awaiting execution for crime. Here the petitioner is under sentence of death pronounced by the supreme court for the crime of murder. The sheriff of Dona Ana county must carry the sentence into execution. By an adjudication of lunacy by the district court of Santa Fe county, it is sought to destroy the effect of the sentence pronounced by this court. A brief consideration of the statute will show that it was not intended to have the application contended for by the petitioner. Section 3387 of the statute gives to the district court conducting the investigation the power to make such orders for the care and custody of the person so found to be a lunatic as it shall think necessary and proper. Section 3393 gives to the committee of such insane person the management and control "of his person and estate." A named individual is in confinement awaiting execution for a capital offense, under judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. The defendant is placed in some other county, as here, in the state penitentiary for safe-keeping. A district court, under this statute, assumes jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of the lunacy of such defendant. Under the statute it would be the duty of the court to appoint a committee of the person and estate of such lunatic, and the statute gives the committee the custody of such person. Clearly we think it was not the intention of the legislature to confer upon a district court power, by this statute, to conduct such investigation in such cases, and turn the custody of a person in confinement over to a committee. A similar question was presented in the case of Ferguson v. Martineau, 115 Ark. 317, 171 S. W. 472, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 421. In this state, under a similar statute, conferring upon the probate court the jurisdiction to conduct the investigation, one Arthur Hodges was convicted of murder in the first degree. After conviction, and while awaiting execution of the sentence, an inquiry was instituted in the probate court under the statute as to the sanity of the said Hodges. The result of the investigation was an adjudication of his insanity. After the adjudication an application was made to the chancery court for an injunction against the commissioners of the Arkansas penitentiary, restraining them from executing Hodges on the date set for his execution. The chancery court granted the petition, and issued an order enjoining the commissioners from executing Hodges. The commissioners applied to the supreme court for a writ of prohibition directed to the judge of the chancery court and to the judge of the county and probate courts theretofore assuming jurisdiction, prohibiting them from interfering with the execution of Hodges on the date set for the same. The judge of the probate court set up in response to the petition that the writ of prohibition should not issue for the reason that the probate court had jurisdiction to conduct the investigation, and that such jurisdiction had been lawfully exercised. The court in disposing of this branch of the case said: "It is further insisted that the chancery court had jurisdiction to issue the injunction ancillary to or in aid of the jurisdiction of the probate court to enable it to enforce its orders. The chancery court has no such jurisdiction; but, if it were conceded that the chancery court had such jurisdiction, the injunction could not properly issue in aid of the probate court's jurisdiction, for the probate court itself was without jurisdiction. The statute under which the respondents claim that the probate court has jurisdiction, to wit, § 4003 of Kirby's Digest, is as follows: 'If any person shall give information in writing to such court that any person in his county is an idiot, lunatic, or of unsound mind, and pray that an inquiry thereof be had, the court, if satisfied that there is good cause for the exercise of its jurisdiction, shall cause the person so charged to be brought before such court and inquire into the facts by a jury, if the facts be doubtful.' This statute was enacted solely for the purpose of protecting the civil and property rights of insane persons, as is clearly shown by the section itself and the other sections of the same chapter (chap. 83, Kirby's Dig.). It has no reference whatever to determining the issue of the sanity of one who has been convicted and sentenced to be executed for a criminal offense, and who is already in the custody of the law for that purpose."

In the case Re Lang, 77 N. J. L. 207, 71 Atl. 47, Lang had been convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death. A proceeding was instituted before the judge of the court of common pleas, under a statute "concerning the commitment of an insane person into institutions for the cure and treatment of the insane of this state, their confinement therein, and their support while so confined." The jury found the petitioner to be sane, and the matter was removed to the supreme court by certiorari. The court refused to disturb the finding, and an appeal was taken to the court of error and appeals from the judgment of the supreme court. The court affirmed the judgment, but said: "The judgment of the supreme court is affirmed, for the reasons set out in the opinion delivered in that court. It is not to be assumed, from the fact of this affirmance or from any language in the opinion adopted, that this court decides that the question of the insanity of a person who is in confinement awaiting execution under a capital sentence can be tested by a proceeding taken under § 13 of the Act of 1906 (Pamph. Laws, p. 722). This question was not argued and not considered." 76 N. J. L. 829, 72 Atl. 1118.

In a later case, Re Herron, 77 N. J. L. 315, 72 Atl. 133, the supreme court of New Jersey held that the insanity of a person who is in confinement, awaiting execution under a capital sentence, could not be tested by a proceeding taken under § 13 of the Act of July 5, 1906 (Pamph. Laws 1906, p. 722). The court said:

"Now, as already remarked, in those cases where it is only a question whether a convict shall be imprisoned in a penitentiary or an asylum, the existence of this power thus put into the hands of a single medical expert, and the failure of the legislature to indicate any type of insanity, the restoration to which type shall return the prisoner to his former place of imprisonment, matters little, or not at all; but where a sentence is not to imprisonment, but a sentence to death, it seems impossible to believe that the legislature, under language so general in character, with no allusion to this exceptional situation, intended that the sentenced person should be immune from punishment."

As remarked by the supreme court of New Jersey, in considering the statute there in question, if the legislature intended that the power of removal, under § 13, to the insane asylum, extended to persons under sentence of death, why was not some provision made for a reprieve or stay of the sentence, or why was not some provision made that the application under § 13 should operate as a stay, coupled with the power of removal? Under our statute no provision is made for staying execution in a capital case, where a proceeding is instituted to investigate the sanity of a person or for the granting of a reprieve, or for the execution of the sentence upon the restoration of the person to sanity. In fact, the statute is silent upon all such questions, and not a word or sentence has any reference whatever to a person awaiting execution, or undergoing imprisonment under sentence imposed by a court. For these reasons we are compelled to conclude that the district court of Santa Fe county had no jurisdiction of power to conduct the investigation into the question of the sanity or insanity of the petitioner. This being true, this court was not required to suspend the execution of the death sentence upon the filing in this court of a certified copy of such adjudication; and the petition asking the court to so stay the execution must be denied.

All the courts hold, so far as we are advised, that the common law forbids the trial, sentencing, or execution of an insane person for a crime, while he continues in that state. Many of the states have statutes to that effect. Cases discussing the question and supporting our view are: Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216; State v. Vann, 84 N. C. 722; Bulger v. People, 61 Colo. 187, 156 Pac. 800; Davidson v. Com. 174 Ky. 789, 192 S. W. 846. In the case of State ex rel. Lyons v. Chretien, 114 La. 81, 38 So. 27, the court, while holding that it was discretionary with the court, upon suggestion of the insanity of one about to be executed, to take action in the premises, held that in such a case the defendant had no legal right to such action, but that it was a question of humanity. In the case of Nobles v. Georgia, 168 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. 515, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87, the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing the rule in such a case at common law, said: "In other words, by the common law, if, after conviction and sentence, a suggestion of insanity was made, not that the judge to whom it was made should, as a matter of right, proceed to summon a jury and have another trial, but that he should take such action as, in his discretion, he deemed best."

Laros v. Com. 84 Pa. 200, where a suggestion of insanity was made after verdict as follows: "The plea at this stage is only an appeal to the humanity of the court to postpone the punishment until a recovery takes place, or as a merciful dispensation."

In 4 Bl. Com. p. 396, the author says: "Another cause of regular reprieve is, if the defendant becomes non compos between the judgment and the award of execution; for regularly, as was formally observed, though a man be compos when he commits a capital crime, yet if he becomes non compos after, he shall not be indicted; if after indictment, he shall not be convicted; if after conviction, he shall not receive judgment; if after judgment, he shall not be ordered for execution; for 'furiosus solo furore punitur,' and the law knows not but he might have offered some reason, if in his senses, to have stayed these respective proceedings. It is therefore an invariable rule, when any time intervenes between the attainder and the award of execution, to demand of the prisoner what he hath to allege why execution should not be awarded against him; and if he appears to be insane, the judge in his discretion may and ought to reprieve him."

In view of the foregoing, and as a matter of humanity, this court felt that the judgment of the district court of Santa Fe county, filed in this court as stated, was a sufficient suggestion to the court that the question of the sanity or insanity of the petitioner should be investigated, as a matter of humanity; and in order that the court might have time to hear the evidence, and to give to petitioner ample time to produce such evidence as might be available in support of his alleged insanity, a stay of execution was granted him as set out in the statement of facts. That the court had the power to grant the stay for this purpose is supported by the authorities. Bulger v. Peo- ple, 61 Colo. 187, 156 Pac. 800; Miller's Case, 9 Cow. 730; Fufts v. State, 2 Sneed, 232; State v. Vann, 84 N. C. 722; Parker v. State, 135 Ind. 534, 23 L.R.A. 859, 35 N. E. 179.

The question of the right of the petitioner to a trial by a jury in this court of the question of his alleged insanity must likewise be resolved against him. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 622. In the case of Nobles v. Georgia, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a trial of the question of the insanity of a convict, suggested after the verdict and sentence, is, at common law, in the discretion of the judge, without an absolute right on his part to have the issue tried before a court and jury. In the case of State v. Nordstrom, 21 Wash. 403, 53 L.R.A. 584, 58 Pac. 248, the court held that where, after sentence of death upon a prisoner, his insanity is alleged, and the court has satisfied itself of the prisoner's sanity, either from its own examination or from that of a commission appointed for the purpose, the action of the court in refusing the prisoner a trial in which he would have the right to be represented by counsel and to examine witnesses was not reviewable on appeal, and approved of the action of the lower court.

In the case of Ex parte Schneider, 21 D. C. 433, Schneider had been convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death, and the judgment had been affirmed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. A petition was filed in the court by the prisoner and counsel, stating that Schneider "is now insane," and an order was asked postponing his execution, and that the court should institute proceedings to ascertain the truth of this averment. The matter was certified to the general term, which passed an order postponing the execution and directing a method which seemed best suited to prosecute the inquiry. The method adopted was that the court itself decided to hear the evidence as to the alleged insanity of the party, and appointed a commission of experts to examine the person so awaiting execution, and heard the evidence pro and con on the question. In the present state of our law in this jurisdiction, we are of the opinion that it is within <sup>—trial of question of sanity.</sup> the province of the court, upon the suggestion of the insanity of the person awaiting execution under a death sentence, to adopt such method as to the court seems best suited to enable it to arrive at the truth of the question. We decided to hear the evidence upon the question as to the alleged insanity of Smith in open court, and fixed a day for such hearing. The evidence was heard as heretofore stated, and we are now confronted with the question of weighing the same and deciding as to whether Smith should pay the penalty for his crime, or whether the execution of the sentence should be further stayed.

First, as to the law in the case: No plea of insanity was interposed as a defense to the prosecution in the trial court, nor was such a plea interposed prior to the judgment. The court instituted inquiry, as stated, because of a doubt entertained as to the sanity of the accused. The law upon the question as to the degree of insanity which would justify the court in giving to the prisoner a stay of execution may be briefly stated as follows:

If the prisoner has not at the present time, from the defects of his faculties, sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, what he was tried for, the purpose of his punishment, the impending fate which awaits him, a sufficient understanding to know any fact which might exist which would make his punishment unjust or unlawful, and the intelligence requisite to convey such information to his attorneys or the court, then he would not be sane and should not be executed. On the other hand, if he fully understands all the facts relative to the crime for which he was tried and the purpose for which he is about to be punished, and can intelligently set forth any fact which may exist as to why the judgment should not be carried into execution, and comprehends his situation and his surroundings, then he would be sane within the law, and subject to execution.

In Re Lang, 77 N. J. L. 207, 71 Atl. 47, the court approved of the following instruction given to the jury, where the question of the insanity arose after conviction: "If, therefore, a person sentenced for a crime is capable of understanding the nature and object of the proceedings going on against him, if he rightly comprehends his own condition in reference to such proceedings, and can conduct his defense in a rational manner, he is, for the purpose of undergoing punishment, deemed to be sane, although on some other subjects his mind may be deranged or unsound. If the prisoner has not at the present time, from the defects of his faculties, sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of these proceedings against him, and his impending fate and execution, the jury ought to find that he is not sane, and upon such finding he may be ordered to be kept in custody until his disability is removed."

In the case of State v. Helm, 69 Ark. 167, 61 S. W. 915, the supreme court of Arkansas was called upon to consider the degree of insanity which would exempt one from punishment, after verdict, and before judgment. In that state they had a statute on the subject, which the court, however, held was simply declaratory of the common law. The court said: "We therefore conclude and decide that, if a person convicted of a crime is, by reason of a disease of the mind, unable to understand the nature of the indictment upon which he was convicted, his plea thereto, and the verdict thereon, when explained to him by the court, and is unable to comprehend his own condition in reference to such proceeding, and by reason thereof might not make known to the court or the attorneys in charge of his defense the facts within his knowledge, if any, which would show that judgment should not be pronounced against him, he is, as to the pronouncing of such judgment, to be deemed insane, within the meaning of the statute."

In the case of Lee v. State, 118 Ga. 764, 45 S. E. 628, the question was raised, as in this case, after judgment. The court approved a charge given by the lower court to the effect that before the prisoner could be found insane it should be shown that he would not know he would deserve punishment for doing a wrong act, and would not comprehend the reason why he was being punished. In the case of Ex parte Schneider, 21 D. C. 433, the court held that, on a petition for an order suspending the execution of a criminal alleged to be insane, the court is required, before it can nullify the verdict of the jury and the judgment and sentence, to find that the prisoner is actually insane, so as to be wholly unconscious of his situation. In the case of Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216, the court considered a statute which declared: "No insane person can be tried, sentenced to any punishment, or punished for any crime or offense, while he continues in that state."

The court stated that this statute was in strict conformity with the common-law rule on the subject. After considering many cases on the subject, the court said: "With these lights before us, the construction of the statute which forbids the trial of any insane person cannot be attended with much difficulty. A state of general insanity, the mental powers being wholly perverted or obliterated, would necessarily preclude a trial; for a being in that deplorable condition can make no defense whatever. Not so, however, where the disease is partial, and confined to some subject other than the imputed crime and the contemplated trial. A person in this condition may be fully competent to understand his situation in respect to the alleged offense, and to conduct his defense with discretion and reason."

In a recent case in California, People v. Lawson, — Cal. —, 174 Pac. 885, the court said: "The evidence on the question of insanity was amply sufficient to support the conclusion that the defendant was sane within the meaning of the law applicable. That he was not perfectly poised mentally may be freely conceded. Such, however, is not the test. There was no substantial showing to the effect that his mind was in such a condition that he did not rightly comprehend his own condition with reference to the proceedings against him, that he had been convicted of a crime punishable by death, and was before the court for the purposes of judgment on that conviction, or that he was then unable to present in a rational have, either on motion for new trial manner any defense that he might or to the pronouncing of judgment. Under the well-settled rule in this state, it was incumbent on the defense to show this by a preponderance of evidence. The burden of proof was upon him."

No cases to the contrary of this rule have been cited by counsel for petitioner.

Tested by this rule, we will proceed to examine the evidence and ascertain whether the petitioner is insane to such an extent that he should not undergo the punishment decreed.

Petitioner's sister, Mrs. N. Jacco, of Berkeley, California, testified that from 1898 to 1900 her brother, the petitioner, lived a neighbor to her in Butte, Montana, for six months; that on one occasion while living in Butte petitioner acted as though he were of unsound mind. She said they were having labor trouble in Butte, and the militia had been called out; they were all sitting in the yard, when her brother became very excited, ran into the house, and got a shotgun; he said he knew the soldiers were going to kill his baby, a child three months old; her husband took the gun from him; that her brother later went to Alaska, returning from there in 1908 or 1909; that when he returned from Alaska he came to her home in Sacramento; that he was a complete wreck, the doctor stating that he was in the worst stages of syphilis; that he had no control over the different parts of his body, and detailing other symptoms which would indicate presence of the disease stated; that he had been almost constantly in trouble of various kinds since he returned from Alaska; had served a term in the penitentiary at San Quentin; that he had an exaggerated idea of his own importance; that he would not talk to his sister about anything but water power; that he talked about a water wheel, saying that he was going to put in electric power all over the state; that he always talked up in the millions of dollars; that he made a great number of drawings of his scheme, and that he had never had any connection with machinery or irrigation in his life; that he had at one time advertised for someone to go into the butcher business with him, but that he had no money and had never been in the butcher business in his life. This, in substance, was the effect of the sister's testimony, elaborated, however, much more extensively than above set out.

The deposition of Dr. W. A. Cusick, of Salem, Oregon, was taken. The doctor testified that he had been practising for a great number of years; that he was eighty years of age; that his practice had been general, but more particularly confined to the diseases of the nervous system; that he made an examination of A. B. Smith in the courthouse at Salem, Oregon, about seven years ago; Smith had been arrested for larceny; that the result of his examination was that he came to the conclusion at that time that Smith was not responsible for his acts in connection with the crime with which he was charged; that he regarded him as a mental derelict, otherwise a congenital paranoiac; that Smith's comprehension, owing to his mental condition, would be more or less indefinite, and he doubted if he could rightfully understand any proceedings against him; he also had doubts if he could present any matter in a rational manner; that Smith would be likely to misjudge a question of fact, whether it was associated with his cause under consideration or otherwise; that Smith was not a monomaniac, but a paranoiac, irrational on all subjects.

Joe Melugin likewise testified by deposition to the effect that he was the keeper of the cell house at the state penitentiary in which Smith was confined during the months of June, July, and August, 1918; that in his opinion Smith was suffering from a form of insanity; that he would take small pieces of tobacco and wrap them up and conceal them about his cell; that he would also take all the small pieces of string and twine he could get, and wrap them up and hide them about his cell. When the witness asked what he was doing it for, he stated that sometimes even a small string might make a million dollars for a person; that in discussing his former dealings he always talked in large numbers, seldom speaking in amounts of less than $100,000; that he spent a great deal of his time drawing what he called plans for some machinery for perpetual motion.

The superintendent of the state penitentiary, Thomas Hughes, and the assistant warden, Pat Dugan, both testified. Hughes stated that he saw Smith on an average of once a week during all the time that he had been confined there, which was for several months; that he talked with him frequently; and that Smith appeared perfectly rational at all these times. He had discussed with him fully the transaction of the killing of Sheriff Stephens by the escaped prisoners from the Deming jail, of which Smith was one, and that he gave him a very rational account of the affair. He told the superintendent, however, that he (Smith) did not have a gun and did not fire a shot, and that he could not understand, therefore, why he should receive the same punishment as that meted out to Starr, who confessedly had fired the shot that killed Sheriff Stephens. He gave it as his judgment that Smith was a rational-minded man.

Dugan testified that he saw Smith almost every day, talked with him frequently, and that Smith appeared to be a very intelligent man. Smith had likewise told him about the trouble, and gave a very lucid and connected account thereof. Both witnesses testified that after the affirmance of the judgment of the lower court, when Smith knew that his execution was but a matter of days, he became very nervous and excited, and seemed to fear death very much. Neither witness had talked to Smith on the subject of water wheels or water power.

The three doctors who examined Smith and testified at the hearing in the district court were produced, namely, Dr. Diaz, Dr. Knapp, and Dr. Umler. These physicians were all general practitioners, neither of whom had made a special study of mental diseases. They testified that Smith was a paranoiac; that they had made two examinations of him, and had led him out upon the subject of water power and irrigation, and that he had described to them some wonderful invention which he claimed to have perfected, which would revolutionize the water power system of the country, and that he was being persecuted by the governor of the state of California and other men, who desired to prevent him from perfecting his great invention; that Smith also had delusions of grandeur, and imagined that he was being persecuted; that on other subjects he appeared to be rational, and talked in an intelligent and rational manner.

Dr. Diaz stated that Smith had delusions and hallucinations on some subjects, while probably on others he was normal; that he seemed to be normal in everything except upon the subject of water power and hydraulics, and the hallucinations of persecution; that upon most subjects he talked reasonably; that it was his opinion that Smith understood and appreciated what was taking place in court at the time of the hearing; that Smith did not seem to realize and understand for what purpose he was being punished. He did not know whether Smith would have the knowledge of right and wrong on subjects disassociated from his hallucinations. In answer to questions by the court, Dr. Diaz stated that he appeared to be normal on all subjects except water and his hallucinations of persecution.

Dr. Umberhine testified that along certain lines disassociated from these delusions Smith seemed to be normal, but that along certain other lines he would not be; that the fact that he had delusions upon the subject of water power would not necessarily indicate that he was insane generally, and had no knowledge of right and wrong; that he could have a rational idea of right and wrong; that Smith realized what was taking place at the time of the present hearing, but that he did not realize it like a normal man would; that Smith did realize and understand the extent of his punishment, and what it was being done for; that the two examinations he made as to Smith's sanity were not enough to enable him to form an opinion as to Smith's responsibility in respect to the crime with which he was charged.

Dr. Knapp testified that he did not think Smith was able to take care of his own affairs, but that he did realize what he was charged with, and that he realized his present situation; that he knew what he was being punished for, and that his execution would be a punishment; that he realized what it was for; that it was the penalty for the crime with which he was charged; that he thought Smith would be able to carry on ordinary business affairs and that in most cases he would consider him normal; that he thought Smith was normal on subjects aside from the delusions mentioned; that his delusions would not interfere with his ability to distinguish as between right and wrong in connection with the crime with which he was charged; that he might commit a crime of the character with which he was charged without realizing that he was doing a wrongful act.

Dr. Elder, who was present at the hearing in this court, and who later made an examination of Smith in connection with Dr. Massie, at the request of the attorney general, testified that in his judgment a true paranoiac was not responsible in any direction; that he did not believe that he would appreciate the fact that his punishment was retribution, and not persecution; that, from the extent of his examination of Smith, he found nothing that would indicate that Smith did not fully appreciate and comprehend his present situation. He was not prepared to say that Smith was a paranoiac from the examination which he had made, but stated that, if a man has delusions and the other deficiencies that a paranoiac has, he is not responsible in any direction; that is, a man cannot be insane in one direction and perfectly sane on any other question; that he made intelligent answers to all questions propounded to him by the witness and Dr. Massie.

Dr. J. A. Rolls testified that the fact that Smith had been a hard drinker, and had suffered with syphilis, did not indicate that he was a paranoiac; that the result of a brain disease caused by syphilis would be what is known as paresis, and not paranoia; that nothing had been stated at the time of the hearing at which the doctor testified that would lead him to believe that Smith was an insane man.

Dr. J. A. Massie testified that he was the prison physician, and had made an examination of Smith; that he gave him clear answers to all questions that were asked of him; that he was extremely nervous and evidently very much afraid; that he thought that Smith comprehended and realized his position in regard to his impending execution; that he had sufficient intelligence to realize what he was being punished for; that in his opinion, based upon what he had read in the different medical works on the subject of paranoia, outside of his delusions, he is able and competent of conducting business, and that his sense of right and wrong, outside of that one delusion, is practically normal; that a man abnormal on the subject of water, and who has committed a crime having nothing to do with the delusion, would be capable of conducting his defense; that Smith appreciates his position to-day, that he is under sentence of death. And he named many medical works which hold that on all questions outside of the delusion they have a proper sense of right and wrong.

The above constitutes a synopsis of all the evidence submitted to the court. We have carefully considered the same, and are of the opinion that Smith is sane, and that he <sup>Evidence—sufficiency.</sup>

has sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him and his impending fate and execution, and that he understands, knows, and <sup>—insanity—
sufficiency.</sup>

is able to allege any fact which might exist tending to show that he should not be executed. Under the authorities hereinbefore referred to, his execution should not be stayed, but the judgment which the law has pronounced should be carried out.

For the foregoing reasons, the court must decline to stay the execution.

ANNOTATION.

Test of present insanity which will prevent trial for crime or punishment after conviction.

The question whether a deaf-mute may be placed on trial for, or punished after conviction of, a crime, though somewhat analogous, is not within the scope of the note. The question under annotation is, of course, distinct from the question of mental capacity at the time of the offense, as affecting guilt.

Insanity precluding trial for crime.

In order to raise a doubt as to the sanity of one about to be tried on a criminal charge, it is said in State v. Arnold (1861) 12 Iowa, 479, that there must be a question whether at the time there is such mental impairment, either under the form of idiocy, intellectual or moral imbecility, or the like, as to render it probable that the accused cannot, as far as may devolve upon him, have a full, fair, and impartial trial.

This involves an inquiry whether the accused is mentally competent to make a rational defense. Freeman v. People (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216; People v. Lake (1855) 2 Park. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 215; Guagando v. State (1874) 41 Tex. 626; People v. Nyhan (1918) 171 N. Y. Supp. 466; Frith's Case (1790) 22 How. St. Tr. (Eng.) 311 (holding that no man shall be called upon to make his defense at a time when his mind is in that situation as not to appear capable of so doing; for, however guilty he may be, the inquiry into his guilt must be postponed to that season when, by collecting together his intellects and having them entire, he shall be able so to model his defense as to ward off the punishment of the law); People v. West (1914) 25 Cal. App. 369, 143 Pa. 793 (holding that on an inquiry under Cal. Penal Code, § 1368, as to the sanity of one accused of crime, the question to be submitted to the jury is whether the accused is mentally competent to make a rational defense, and not as to his responsibility for the crime charged; which would involve an inquiry whether he knew the difference between right and wrong, and could distinguish the quality and consequences of his act.

It may be inquired whether the accused, by reason of insanity, is able to comprehend his position. State v. Peacock (1887) 50 N. J. L. 34, 11 Atl. 270. Or whether he has mind and discretion which would enable him to appreciate the charge against him and the proceedings thereon. Jordan v. State (1911) 124 Tenn. 81, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1115, 135 S. W. 327. Or whether he is mentally capable of rendering his attorneys such assistance as a proper defense to the indictment preferred against him demands. Ibid.; State v. O'Grady (1896) 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 654 (holding the test of sanity in an inquiry as to whether one indicted for murder, and who is alleged to be insane, should be placed on trial, is whether he is sane enough to recall the events of his life, and to represent to counsel the facts which ought to be stated and presented to a jury upon trial of the indictment); United States v. Chisolm (1906) 149 Fed. 284 (holding that a person, though not entirely sane, may be put upon trial in a criminal case, if he rightly comprehends his own condition with reference to the proceedings, and has such possession and control of his mental powers, including the faculty of memory, as will enable him to testify intelligently and give his counsel all the material facts bearing upon the criminal act charged against him, and material to repel criminating evidence).

But evidence of mere incapacity to fully understand and comprehend his legal rights, and to make known in the most succinct and intelligent manner, to his counsel, all the facts material to his defense, is not sufficient ground for refraining from proceeding to trial. State v. Arnold (1861) 12 Iowa, 479.

So, it is said in Taylor v. Com.

(1885) 109 Pa. 262, that while a slight departure from a well-balanced mind may be pronounced insanity in medical science, yet such a rule cannot be recognized in the administration of the law, when a person is on trial for the commission of a crime.

In Re Buchanan (1900) 129 Cal. 330, 50 L.R.A. 378, 61 Pac. 1120, the supreme court held that there is a difference between the medical view of insanity, and the view upon which the California statute, requiring a suspension of proceedings against an insane criminal, is founded; and that the question must be determined with reference to the latter, which merely reenacts the common law, and recognizes no form of insanity except that which manifests itself in mental deficiency or in mental derangement.

If a person arraigned for a crime is capable of understanding the nature and object of the proceedings going on against him, and rightly comprehends his own condition in reference to such proceedings, and can conduct his defense in a rational manner, he is, for the purpose of being tried, to be deemed sane, although on some other subjects his mind may be deranged or unsound. Freeman v. People (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216; People v. Rhinelander (1884) 2 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 335; Jordan v. State (1911) 124 Tenn. 81, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1115, 135 S. W. 327.

"It is impossible," says the court in United States v. Chisolm (Fed.) supra, "to lay down any fixed rule, as a matter of law, as to any particular state of facts which will unerringly demonstrate sanity, or the contrary condition of the human mind, or the degree of aberration which, when found to exist, exempts an accused person from criminal responsibility, or unfits him to rationally aid in his defense when arraigned for a crime.

. . . But whether or not an individual's departure from general rules governing human action demonstrates such aberration of mind as exempts him from criminal responsibility, or shows unfitness on that account to be placed on trial, depends upon the circumstances of the particular case; and is to be gathered not merely from the act for which he is arraigned, but must also be determined and tested in view of every other fact and circumstance which sheds light upon the condition of the defendant's mind at the period as to which the inquiry is directed."

In Com. v. Braley (1804) 1 Mass. 103, the prisoner indicted for the murder of his wife, upon being arraigned to plead, said that he did not know what to say; that it appeared to him she was still alive; it seemed to him he had seen her since; and added that he was guilty of what he had done, but did not know what he had done; whereby the court submitted to a jury the question whether the prisoner neglected or refused to plead to the indictment against him for murder, of his free will or malice, or whether he did so neglect by the act of God, and, upon the jury finding the latter alternative, the court did not proceed to try the prisoner, who was remanded.

In Com. v. Hathaway (1816) 13 Mass. 299, one indicted for murder pleaded not guilty on his arraignment, but showed strong marks of mental derangement, and a jury was impaneled by the direction of the court to try and determine whether he was sane or not. During the examination the prisoner often interrupted the witnesses by wild and incoherent remarks, and from his whole manner disclosed that he was under the influence of a religious frenzy. The jury returned their verdict that he was not of sane memory, and he was remanded to prison.

In the following cases, under the circumstances stated, the mental condition of the accused was found to be such as to preclude his being placed on trial:

The prisoner, when called upon to plead, in Ley's Case (1828) 1 Lewin, C. C. (Eng.) 239, broke out into incoherent declamations as though his mind was disordered, and a jury was, in consequence, impaneled to try whether his not pleading was the effect of malice or by reason of insanity, and the court charged them that if there was a doubt as to the prisoner's sanity, and a surgeon had testified that it was doubtful, they could not say that he was in a fit state to be put upon his trial.

In Reg. v. Goode (1837) 7 Ad. & El. (Eng.) 536, the prisoner, when called upon to plead, showed clear symptoms of insanity in his demeanor, and, upon his not pleading, an inquest was taken to determine his sanity, and the court, after examining witnesses and in view of the conduct of the prisoner, did not think it necessary to ask him whether he wished to cross-examine the witnesses or to say or prove anything for himself, since it was clear that this would be a mockery and waste of time, and a useless prolongation of the painful proceeding.

A man who is convinced that a "blower and wireless" are being operated on him, who perverts and imagines noises and voices of people, who is urged by influences and voices of his own insane creation to protect himself, and who believes that his wife, whom he murdered, was killed by men who sought also to destroy him, is not in a mental condition to appreciate the proceedings of a trial, and undertake his defense. People v. Nyhan (1918) 171 N. Y. Supp. 466.

The reason of the rule prohibiting the trial of one accused of crime while he is insane is stated to be his incapacity to make a just defense. Freeman v. People (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216; State v. Helm (1901) 69 Ark. 167, 61 S. W. 915. This has led to an extension of the rule to analogous cases, where the incapacity of the accused to aid in his defense arose from intoxication.

It is ground for a new trial that one upon trial for felony was so stupid from intoxication as not to be able to understand the peril of his condition, or the facts of his case, and could not communicate with his counsel with intelligence, or assist them in their defense of him, or avoid the repugnance, and perhaps the prejudice, which must have resulted from his debased and disgraceful condition. Taffe v. State (1861) 23 Ark. 34. The court said: When it was ascertained that the accused was not able to make such defense as he could or might have made in the use of his right reason, and whether this inability was owing to drunkenness or to any cause beyond his control, the law is the same.

But a person who has no delusions, but is more than ordinarily intelligent, with memory unimpaired, and who appreciates exactly the nature of the criminal charge against him, and his relation to the proceeding, and who, so far as mental operation is concerned, is as sane as men are ordinarily, though, on account of a serious illness resulting from indulgence in the excessive use of intoxicating drink, his brain is affected so as to change his character, whereby he has lost ambition, become aimless and trifling, and has deteriorated in moral character, while his appetite for intoxicants has become uncontrollable at frequent intervals, so that, if at liberty, he will inevitably take to drinking, and when under the influence of intoxicants will be dangerous, is not insane within the meaning of the statutes providing for the suspension of proceedings against insane criminals. Re Buchanan (1900) 129 Cal. 330, 50 L.R.A. 378, 61 Pac. 1120.

In Kinloch's Case (1746) 18 How. St. Tr. (Eng.) 395, the court refers to the case put by Lord Hale (1 Hale, P. C. 35), that "in case a man in a phrenzy happen by some oversight to plead to his indictment, and put himself on his trial; and it appeareth to the court on his trial that he is mad; the judge in discretion may discharge the jury of him, and remit him to gaol to be tried after the recovery of his understanding." The court then observes: The common sense and feeling of mankind, the voice of nature, reason, and revelation, all concur in this plain rule, that no man is to be condemned unheard; and consequently no trial ought to proceed to the condemnation of a man who, by the providence of God, is rendered totally incapable of speaking for himself, or of instructing others to speak for him.

Fed. 284, where the court, on a suggestion of the insanity of the accused, suspended the trial and submitted to the jury the question whether the prisoner, at the time, was possessed of sufficient mental power and had such understanding of his situation as to readily comprehend his condition with reference to the proceedings against him, and such coherency of ideas, control of the mental faculties, and the requisite power of memory as would enable him to testify in his own behalf, if he so desired, and otherwise to properly and intelligently aid his counsel in making a rational defense.

But in Reg. v. Southey (1865) 4 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 864, where the insanity of the defendant on trial for murder was not suggested until after the case had been opened and the first witness examined, the court permitted the trial to proceed, but submitted to the jury, as one of the questions for their determination, whether the accused was then sane and in a fit state to be tried.

Insanity precluding judgment or punishment for crime.

If a person convicted of a crime is, by reason of a disease of the mind, unable to understand the nature of the indictment upon which he is convicted, his plea thereto, and the verdict thereon, when explained to him by the court, and is unable to comprehend his own condition in reference to such proceeding, and by reason thereof might not make known to the court or his attorneys in charge of his defense, the facts within his knowledge, if any, which would show that judgment should not be pronounced against him, he is, as to the pronouncing of such judgment, to be deemed insane within the meaning of the statute providing that insanity may be shown as a legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced. State v. Helm (Ark.) supra. In this case the court condemned as erroneous an instruction which authorized the jury to find the defendant insane, if they found from the preponderance of the evidence that he could not "intelligently reason," since it is reasonably calculated to induce the jury to believe that he should be possessed of more intelligence and mental capacity at the time judgment is pronounced against him, as a prerequisite to such proceeding, than is necessary.

The test of the question as to whether one about to be executed is sane or insane, as laid down in the reported case (STATE v. SMITH, ante, 83), is whether or not such person, at the time of the examination, from the defects of his faculties, has sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, what he was tried for, the purpose of his punishment, the impending fate which awaits him, and a sufficient understanding to know any facts which might exist which would make his punishment unjust or unlawful, and the intelligence requisite to convey such information to his attorneys or the court. If he has, then he is sane; otherwise, he is insane, and should not be executed.

The provisions of N. J. Pamph. Laws, pp. 715, 722, concerning the commitment to asylums of criminal lunatics under sentence, do not establish a different test of insanity than that laid down by the common law, which is, whether the prisoner is capable of understanding the nature and object of the proceedings going on against him, or rightly comprehends his own condition in reference to such proceedings, and can conduct his defense in a rational manner. If so, he is, for the purpose of undergoing punishment, deemed to be sane, although on some other subjects his mind may be deranged or unsound. Re Lang (1908) 77 N. J. L. 207, 71 Atl. 47, affirmed in (1909) 76 N. J. L. 829, 72 Atl. 1118.

On a suggestion of the insanity of one convicted of murder and arraigned for judgment, the test to be applied in an inquiry as to his sanity, authorized by Cal. Penal Code, is whether the mind of the accused is in such a condition that he does not rightly comprehend his own condition with reference to the proceedings against him, or that he has been convicted of a crime punishable by death, and is before the court for the purpose of judgment on that conviction, or that he is then unable to present in a rational manner any defense that he might have, either on motion for a new trial or to the pronouncing of judgment. People v. Lawson (1918) — Cal. —, 174 Pac. 885.

A charge that before one convicted of murder, and who is alleged to have become insane since his conviction and sentence, could be found insane, it should be shown that he would not know he would deserve punishment for doing a certain act, and, if punishment therefor should be inflicted upon him, would not comprehend the reason why he was being punished, was approved in Lee v. State (1903) 118 Ga. 764, 45 S. E. 628.

If the trial court is satisfied that one tried, convicted and sentenced for crime was insane at the time of the trial, or that his mind was affected to such an extent that he was not in a condition to make a defense to the charge, it can award a new trial, notwithstanding the sentence, and the judgment and sentence can be vacated. Humphreys v. State (1897) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 679.

The rule is laid down in Ex parte Schneider (1893) 21 D. C. 433, that the verdict of a jury convicting accused of the crime of murder, the judgment, and sentence of the court will not be nullified on an inquiry as to the sanity of the accused, unless it be shown that the latter is actually insane, so as to be unconscious of his situation. In this case the facts that the accused, about the time of his sentence, neglected his personal appearance and became slovenly and unkempt; that he refused to eat because of an alleged delusion that his food was poisoned; that he asserted that he could not sleep; and also expressed unfounded beliefs and seemed to be afflicted with delusions, were wholly insufficient to justify postponing the execution, in view of contradictory testimony and the probability that the accused was feigning insanity.

The refusal of the trial judge to direct an inquisition into the sanity of one convicted of murder is not an abuse of discretion, where it appeared that the prisoner had once before had "prison psychosis," from which he rapidly recovered when the cause of immediate apprehension had been removed, and since his conviction had had a second attack, which in all probability would disappear rapidly if the causes of its existence were removed. Gonzales v. United States (1913) 40 App. D. C. 450. The court stated: "What would be the result in any case almost, where a man has committed a murder and is sentenced to be hanged, and knows that if he appears sufficiently terrified and peculiar, and shows sufficient signs of being crazy because he is going to be hanged, that he will not be hanged? How many cases would there be where they would not have prison psychosis?"

That the court on the trial of an issue as to the sanity of one under sentence for murder, and brought before it that a new date might be set for the execution of the sentence, submitted to the jury the question whether the mental condition of the prisoner was such that he could not understand the meaning of punishment, and whether he was now sane or insane, instead of submitting to them whether the defendant, by reason of a disease of the mind, was unable to understand the nature of the indictment upon which he was tried and convicted, his plea thereto and the verdict thereon when explained to him by the court, and was unable to comprehend his own condition in reference to such proceeding, and whether by reason thereof he might make known to the court or his attorneys in charge of his defense, the facts within his knowledge, if any, which would show that judgment should not be pronounced against him, especially in view of the fact that his counsel had stated that the defendant was precluded from communicating to him facts relating to after-discovered evidence, is held not erroneous in State v. Bethune (1911) 88 S. C. 401, 71 S. E. 29, on the ground that it had not been made to appear that the accused was prejudiced thereby.

On an inquiry under the Oklahoma statute as to the sanity of one convicted of a criminal offense, the proper question for the jury is whether the accused is mentally competent to make a rational defense, and not whether he is able to distinguish between right and wrong. Marshall v. Territory (1909) 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 136, 101 Pac. 139.

In an inquisition as to the sanity of one convicted of crime, the question for the jury sworn to try the issue is stated, in the charge of the court in United States v. Lancaster (1877) 7 Biss. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 15,555, to be, whether the defendant was so far insane as to be incapable of realizing the peril in which he was placed, and taking such steps as a prudent man under the circumstances would have taken to prepare for his trial, and whether that insane condition still continues. ## FARMERS' NATIONAL BANK, Plff. in Err.,

JOHN E. JOHNSTON.

(— Okla. —, 176 Pac. 236.)

Evidence — of existence of bank.

1. Parol evidence is competent to prove the existence of a national bank, where its existence is called in question collaterally.

Headnotes 1 and 2 by HARDY, J.

Bank — right to sue.

2. A national bank, even in the process of liquidation, may sue and be sued in its own name until its affairs are completely settled.

Evidence — proof of incorporation.

3. In a direct action by the state for the purpose of determining the alleged right of a corporation to transact business, strict proof of due incorporation is required.

[See 7 R. C. L. 102.]

ERROR to the District Court for Sequoyah County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of a check, alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McCombs & McCombs, for plaintiff in error:

The existence of the plaintiff corporation was admitted under the pleadings.

Western Roofing Tile Co. v. Deibler, 30 Okla. 347, 120 Pac. 579.

Before a defendant can raise the corporate existence of a plaintiff, he must make same an issue, either by a plea in the nature of an abatement, or by a special plea in his answer, to the effect that the plaintiff is not a corporation.

Wyman, 3 L.R.A. 503, 38 Fed. 574; Miller v. Campbell Commission Co. 13 Okla. 75, 74 Pac. 507; 10 Cyc. 1351.

Where a national bank, organized under the National Banking Act, goes into liquidation, it does not cease to exist as a corporate body, but may sue and be sued in its own name until its affairs are finally wound up.

Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693; Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. 383, 20 L. ed. 840.

Messrs. W. L. Curtis and Thomas J. Watts for defendant in error.

Hardy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Farmers' National Bank commenced an action against John E. Johnston upon a postdated check drawn on the Sallisaw Bank & Trust Company in favor of Edwards & Company, and by them indorsed to the Farmers' State Bank, which latter institution was converted into the Farmers' National Bank. When the check was presented, payment was refused and the check protested.

The answer of defendant contained a specific denial of the corporate existence of plaintiff, which was duly verified. At the trial, plaintiff proved by oral testimony the existence of plaintiff as a national bank and the conduct of a general banking business by it, and also offered evidence as to the ownership of the check sued upon. At the close of the evidence, verdict was instructed for defendant. This was error. It was proper to prove the corporate existence of plaintiff by parol evidence. Section 5112, Rev. Laws 1910, Evidence—of existence of bank. makes exemplifications of the books of any department of the government of the United States, or any papers filed therein, admissible in evidence in the same manner and with like effect as the originals, when attested by the officer having custody of such originals, and 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 27, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1497, declares that copy of the incorporation certificate of any national banking association, duly certified by the Comptroller of the Currency and authenticated by his seal of office, shall be sufficient evidence, in all courts and places within the jurisdiction of the United States, of the existence of the association. It is contended that this statute makes the character of proof, therein declared to be prima facie proof of the existence of such corporation, the exclusive method by which such fact may be established. The statute does not so declare, nor has it been generally so held by the courts.

In a direct action by the state for the purpose of determining the right of an alleged corporation to transact business, strict proof of due incorporation is required. Zane, Banks & Bkg. § 23. But where the existence is called in question collaterally, that rule does not apply. Higbee v. Aetna Bldg. & L. Asso. 26 Okla. 327, 109 Pac. 236, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 223. And in a majority of cases it is held that parol proof of corporate existence is sufficient to sustain a verdict. Way v. Butterworth, 106 Mass. 75; Farmers' & D. Bank v. Williamson, 61 Mo. 261; Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834; Pacific Drug Co. v. Hamilton, 71 Wash. 469, 128 Pac. 1069; Goldberg B. & Co. v. Dimick, 169 Cal. 187, 146 Pac. 672. There are a number of authorities cited by counsel which merely hold that evidence of the character made prima facie by statute is sufficient to prove the corporate existence of a corporation. These authorities, with but one exception, do not hold that other evidence may not be offered. Sections 3682 and 3715, Rem. & Ball. Code of Washington, which is similar to our statute (Rev. Laws 1910, § 1229), provides for making prima facie proof of corporate existence and payment of the license fee by the certificate of the secretary of state. It is held by the supreme court of that state that this method of establishing the fact is not exclusive, and this rule was applied to an action by a national bank. Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834.

It appeared that after suit was commenced the Farmers' National Bank was placed in process of voluntary liquidation, and at the time of the trial its affairs had not been finally wound up. This did not affect its right to maintain the action. A national bank, even though <sup>Bank—right to sue.</sup> in process of liquidation, may sue and be sued in its own name until its affairs are settled. Oklahoma City Nat. Bank v. Ezzard, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1918A, 411, 159 Pac. 267; Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693. And this is also true where a receiver has been appointed therefor by the Comptroller of the Currency. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. 383, 20 L. ed. 840; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Hartford Deposit Co. 161 U. S. 1, 40 L. ed. 595, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Petition for rehearing denied.

I. In general.

The authority is to the effect that the corporate existence of a national bank may be proved by the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency, authorizing it to do business, given pursuant to the provisions of the National Banking Act, which require him to examine all applications and, upon a finding of a right to commence business, to give a certificate to that effect; it being also provided by the Federal statutes that every certificate issued by the Comptroller of the Treasury in pursuance of law shall be received in evidence in all places and courts, and that copies shall be evidence equally with the originals, and, further, that such certificates shall be "legal and sufficient" evidence of such corporate existence.

And since the Federal statutes authorize a deputy comptroller of the currency to exercise the powers and discharge the duties attached to the office of Comptroller during a vacancy in that office, or during the absence or inability of the Comptroller, a certificate of an acting comptroller given by a deputy while legally performing the duties of the Comptroller's office, meets the requirements of the statute, and is sufficient evidence of the corporate existence of the bank. Keyser v. Hitz (1889) 133 U. S. 138, 33 L. ed. 531, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Weitzel v. Brown (1916) 224 Mass. 190, 112 N. E. 945. To the same effect is *Clement v. The certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency is conclusive evidence as to the completeness of the organization of a national bank, at least, as against collateral attack. *Casey v. A. 323, 93 Fed. 326; and Bailey v. Tillinghast (1900) 40 C. C. A. 98, 99 Fed. 801, which affirmed (1897) 86 Fed. 46. It is not necessary to produce the articles of incorporation in court. First Nat. Bank v. Walker (1915) 27 Idaho, 199, 148 Pac. 46, holding that it was error to rule that the corporate existence of a national bank could be proved only by its articles of incorporation. Nor is a certified copy of the bank's charter necessary. State v. Williams (1899) 152 Mo. 115, 75 Am. St. Rep. 441, 53 S. W. 424.

II. Parol proof.

It has been held that the fact that the Federal statute declares that the certified and authenticated certificate of the Comptroller of the Treasury shall be sufficient evidence, in all courts and places, of the corporate existence of a national bank, does not exclude other methods of proving such existence, or, in other words, that the statute does not establish an exclusive method by which the corporate existence of a national bank may be established. See the reported case (FARMERS' NAT. BANK v. JOHNSTON, ante, 99), where, in applying this rule, the court held that where the corporate existence of a national bank was called in question collaterally it could be proved by parol evidence. But see First Nat. Bank v. Randall (1880) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 545, where, in discussing the question of the right to prove the corporate existence of a national bank by evidence that it was exercising banking functions, and that its officers called it a national bank, the court said that the act of Congress prescribing a mode of proving the organization of national banks is not in derogation of any state law, and that, on principle, such a bank ought to be held to the law organizing it as to evidence of its existence.

And without reference to the Federal statutory provisions as to the method of proving the corporate existence of a national bank, it has been held that the de facto existence of such a corporation may be proved by parol evidence. Thus, in Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe (1893) 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834 (approved in National Bank v. Galland (1896) 14 Wash. 502, 45 Pac. 35), an action by an indorsee national bank upon a note, it was held that the corporate existence of the bank could be prima facie established by parol proof that it was carrying on a general banking business as a national bank, under the name by which it brought suit. And, upon the theory that a national bank is a public institution and its corporate existence a matter of public record, it has been held that, in a suit collaterally involving such corporate existence, it is sufficient to prove a de facto existence by parol evidence that it is carrying on a general banking business, as a national bank organized under the laws of the United States. First Nat. Bank v. Walker (1915) 27 Idaho, 199, 148 Pac. 46. And for the purpose of prosecuting one for a crime committed against a national bank, it has been held that the corporate existence of the bank is prima facie proved by unobjected-to parol evidence of the de facto existence of the bank. Re Van Campen (1868) 2 Ben. 419, Fed. Cas. No. 16,835.

III. State statutes.

It was held in New York Nat. Exch. Bank v. Jones (1880) 9 Daly (N. Y.) 248, that state statutes making it unnecessary, in suits by or against any corporation created under its laws, to prove corporate existence in the absence of a denial thereof, do not apply to national banks so as to dispense with proof of such existence.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT

v.

JAMES NEWMAN, Appt.

(91 Conn. 6, 98 Atl. 346.)

Husband and wife — refusal of support — criminal responsibility — justification.

1. One cannot be convicted of unlawfully refusing to support his wife if she left him without just cause.

Trial — question for jury — desertion of husband.

2. The jury must determine in a prosecution against a man for unlawfully neglecting or refusing to support his wife, who has left him, whether or not she had a reasonable excuse for so doing.

Husband and wife — justification for leaving husband.

3. Any improper conduct upon the part of the husband which would defeat the purpose of the marriage relation will justify the wife in leaving him, although such conduct may not have been intolerable cruelty or adultery.

Evidence — sufficiency — failure to furnish support.

4. The evidence necessary to sustain a prosecution for failure to furnish wife's support is altogether different from that necessary in an action brought directly in the name of or for the benefit of the wife.

Appeal — error in charge — nonprejudicial error.

5. There can be no reversal for failure, in isolated portions of the instructions, properly to state the degree of proof necessary to support an issue, if, upon the entire charge, the jury could not have been misled upon that subject.

Criminal law — failure to support wife — instructions.

6. Instructions in a prosecution for refusal of wife's support that if accused has proved that the parties are living apart from the sole fault of the wife, by sufficient evidence to raise a reasonable doubt whether the refusal to support was or was not unlawful, the verdict should be not guilty, is sufficiently favorable to accused if it follows instructions that the state "must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt, not only that accused has neglected and refused to support his wife, but that he has refused unlawfully," and that refusal is itself unlawful unless excused.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of Waterbury, convicting him of unlawfully neglecting and refusing to support his wife. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kennedy & Coleman, for appellant:

Nothing short of maltreatment of the wife by her husband, or intolerable cruelty on his part toward her, or infidelity on his part, can legally justify the wife's withdrawal from the home and abandonment of her husband.

People v. Pettit, 74 N. Y. 320, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 56; People ex rel. Douglass v. Naehr, 30 Hun, 461, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 513; State v. Schweitzer, 57 Conn. 532, 6 L.R.A. 125, 18 Atl. 787; 14 Cyc. 635.

There is no desertion or failure to support if the wife, without justifiable cause, refuses to live with her husband, or refuses a valid request to return.

Shaw v. Shaw, 17 Conn. 193; 1 Nelson, Marr. & Div. p. 160; Bayne v. People, 14 Hun, 181; People ex rel. Douglass v. Naehr, 30 Hun, 461.

The court should have instructed the jury that the defendant need not prove his defense to any higher or

State v. Schweitzer, 57 Conn. 532, 6 L.R.A. 125, 18 Atl. 787.

The court should have charged the jury respecting the effect of the wife's refusal to return to her husband unless the condition she imposed was complied with by him.

Johnson v. Cooke, 85 Conn. 680, 84 Atl. 97, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 275.

The instructions as to fault were not correct, or adapted to the issue, or sufficient for the guidance of the jury.

Berman v. Kling, 81 Conn. 406, 71 Atl. 507; 1 Nelson, Marr. & Div. p. 160.

Mr. Clayton L. Klein for the State.

Roraback, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a complaint under the Public Acts of 1905, chapter 214, p. 410, charging the defendant with unlawfully neglecting and refusing to support his wife, who had separated from him. It is undisputed that Elizabeth Newman is the wife of the accused and that he has not supported her. This, as the defendant claims and has offered evidence to prove, was owing to the fault of the wife. This charge was contradicted by the wife and by other witnesses.

The act upon which this prosecution is based, in part, provides: "Every person who shall unlawfully neglect or refuse to support his wife or children shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be imprisoned not more than one year, unless he shall show to the court before which the trial is had, that, owing to physical incapacity or other good cause, he is unable to furnish such support: Provided, that in case of conviction for the offense aforesaid, the court before which such conviction is had, may, in lieu of the penalty herein provided, accept from the person convicted a bond to the treasurer of the town in which such conviction is had, or in case of conviction on appeal, to the treasurer of the town in which conviction is originally had, with good and sufficient surety, conditioned for the support of the wife, child, or children, as the case may be, or for the payment of such sum towards such support as the court may find the necessities of the case and the ability of such person may require."

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "No conduct on the part of the defendant in this case, except adultery or conduct toward and treatment of his wife which amount to intolerable cruelty, can justify or excuse her abandonment of him or her refusal to cohabit and live with him."

This request was properly refused. The terms of the statute, "who shall unlawfully neglect or refuse to support his wife," should be put upon broader ground than that claimed for them by the defendant. The statute in question is general in its terms, embodying no exceptions, and, when interpreted fairly, it furnishes no justification for the defendant's contention that this action cannot be maintained unless it appears that the husband has been guilty of adultery or intolerable cruelty. It may be stated that there is no universal proposition that governs the general questions involved in this case. What is a reasonable excuse to justify the wife in leaving her husband, and what conduct of the wife will justify the husband in refusing to support his wife, under the circumstances of a given case, are questions for the jury. Com. v. Ham, 156 Mass. 485-487, 31 N. E. 639, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 1. Of course, any improper conduct upon the part of the husband, which would defeat the purpose of the marriage relation, would justify the wife in separating from her husband, although such conduct might not be intolerable cruelty or adultery. Upon this subject the judge properly instructed the jury as follows: "You should carefully consider all the evidence and circumstances surrounding this accused and his wife generally, and decide whether the departure of the wife from the home was due to her sole fault or due to the fault of the accused. If you believe from the evidence that the wife of the accused left him without just cause, as I have defined just cause for you, then you should find the accused not guilty. If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that this accused has unlawfully neglected or refused to support his wife, then you should find him guilty. You should carefully consider all of the evidence before you, and decide whether the wife left the home of the accused for justifiable reasons, as defined to you, or whether she left without justifiable cause, and for some reason which does not appear here." The court had previously said to the jury: "If the separation between the parties, the breach of the marital relation between them, the denial of the benefits of the marriage relation to the husband, occurred by the sole fault of the wife, or substantially by her sole fault, she could not compel him to support her while by her own fault the marital relation continued to be broken and the benefits of it denied to the husband. But if the fault was a common fault, in which to a substantial extent they both concurred, and by reason of quarrels and bickerings in which they were both responsible in a valid sense, I think he would not be relieved from the primary duty which the law casts upon him of the support of his wife." It also appears that almost one page of the record is filled with instructions of the court, which embody the exact language of the defendant's requests upon this subject. These declarations correctly state well-recognized principles of law relating to this question, and, when read in connection with other portions of the charge upon this point, correctly and fully define the rule applicable to the character and necessary degree of proof in the present case.

It is to be observed that this proceeding is not instituted in the name of the wife, but that it is a criminal prosecution, in the name of the state. The evidence necessary to sustain a prosecution like the present one is altogether different from that in an action brought directly in the name of and for the benefit of the wife. State v. Karagavoorian, 32 R. I. 477, 79 Atl. 1113, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1092.

It is also to be noticed that in the case of Belden v. Belden, 82 Conn. 611, 74 Atl. 896, which was an action by the wife to compel her husband to furnish support, this court said: "An offer by a husband to provide support for his indigent wife at his own home, where she had already suffered, and was likely to continue to suffer, such personal indignities, humiliations, and abuse as to make her life there unendurable, was no defense to the husband in an action against him upon the statute; a proffer of support under such conditions being one that the law would not countenance or recognize."

The eighth, ninth, and tenth assignments of error are criticisms of single, detached sentences of the charge. These portions of the charge, when considered separately, may appear open to the criticism that they improperly state the degree of proof required of the defendant to justify a refusal, upon the defendant's part, to support his wife. But when we regard the entire charge of the court upon this point, we think that the jury could not have been misled upon the subject referred to in these three assignments.

A discussion of the eleventh assignment of error involves a consideration of the question raised by the three assignments just referred to. The eleventh assignment is as follows: "But if he has proved such facts, that is to say, if he has proved that the parties are living apart from the sole fault of the wife, and her refusal to bear the burdens of the marital relation resting upon her, and has proved such facts by a sufficient amount of evidence to raise in your mind a reasonable doubt whether the refusal to support her was or was not unlawful, then the state has failed to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt, and your verdict should be, 'Not guilty.'" The following passage from the charge, which immediately preceded the instructions just referred to, illustrates the manner in which the court treated this subject. It had just stated:

nonprejudicial error.

Evidence—
sufficiency—
failure to furnish support.

"Here, as in every criminal case, gentlemen, the state must make out the facts which are charged beyond a reasonable doubt. It must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt, not only that the accused has neglected and refused to support his wife, but that he has refused unlawfully. But, as I have said, the refusal is in itself unlawful, or the neglect is itself unlawful, unless excused. The defendant must prove some set of facts which justifies his neglect, or you must find the refusal unlawful."

These instructions were sufficiently favorable to the defendant upon this point, and accord with the declarations of this court in the case of State v. Schweitzer, 57 Conn. 532, 540-543, 6 L.R.A. 125, 18 Atl. 787, which was a criminal prosecution for the neglect and refusal of the husband to support his wife.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other Judges concur.

- III. Offer of home by husband, 109.
- IV. Offer to provide home under another's roof, 110.

I. In general.

At common law a husband is not required to support his wife where she, without just cause, refuses to live with him. When he in good faith offers to support and maintain her in a home of his reasonable selection, it is her duty to live with him; and her refusal to accept his offer relieves him from any legal obligation to provide for her. See Kilpatrick v. People (1917) — Colo. —, 170 Pac. 956; Spencer v. State (1907) 132 Wis. 509, 122 Am. St. Rep. 989, 112 N. E. 462, 18 Ann. Cas. 969, and cases generally in this note.

Generally, under statutes punishing abandonment or neglect to support a wife, a husband is not liable where the wife without just cause refuses to live with him.

The New York cases above cited were decided under a statute which makes the wife's liability to become a public charge a condition of the husband's criminal responsibility, and in some of them the failure of the prosecution to establish that condition was an alternative ground for the decision.

While the husband was found guilty of nonsupport in the reported case (STATE v. NEWMAN, ante, 103), the court observed that the husband would not be guilty, under the statute, of unlawfully neglecting and refusing to support his wife, if she left him and continued away from his home without just cause.

So, it is stated in Kilpatrick v. People (Colo.) supra, that where it has been established that the wife left the husband without an adequate excuse, refused without reasonable ground to return to him, and that he offered and was willing to support her if she returned, he cannot be convicted of wilful nonsupport under a statute providing that "any man who shall wilfully neglect, fail, or refuse to provide reasonable support and maintenance for his wife," etc., "shall be deemed guilty of a felony."

And so it was stated in People ex rel. Public Charities Comr. v. Duffin (1910) 68 Misc. 290, 125 N. Y. Supp. 71, that the mere omission of a husband to pay his wife money for a period of eighteen days after the expiration of a bond given for her support upon conviction, while she was of her own volition living apart from him, did not constitute abandonment under a statute rendering guilty as a disorderly person one who abandons his wife without adequate support, leaving her in danger of becoming a public charge, the court stating that, before a husband can be lawfully convicted of this offense, it must appear that he actually and wilfully deserted his wife. It must be established that he left her, that he withdrew from her the aid and protection which were her due by virtue of the marital relation, and that his conduct in these regards arose neither from her consent, her agreement, nor her procurement, but was the outward manifestation of an attempted evasion by him of his marital obligations.

(1906) 115 App. Div. 410, 100 N. Y. Supp. 968, refused to sustain a conviction, where it was improbable that the wife had any reasonable grounds which justified her in refusing to live with her husband, and there was no proof that there was any imminent danger of her becoming a public charge, she having been able to provide for herself, or having relatives who did so.

The fact that a wife refuses to live with her husband, however, is generally no defense, where her reasons for leaving the house of her husband's selection are justifiable. STATE v. NEWMAN (reported herewith), ante, 103; State v. Baurens (1906) 117 La. 136, 41 So. 442; People ex rel. Scherer v. Walsh (1884) 33 Hun (N. Y.) 345; Com. v. Dean (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 641; People v. Paaschen (1918) 195 Misc. 417, 174 N. Y. Supp. 406.

But it was held in State v. Kretzkamp (1915) 87 N. J. L. 80, 93 Atl. 697, that where a wife, by reason of the cruel treatment of her husband, leaves him, her abandonment cannot be construed to be a constructive abandonment of her by him, so as to warrant his indictment and conviction as a husband who deserts or wilfully refuses or neglects to maintain his wife. And it is stated in Stanbrough v. Stanbrough (1878) 60 Ind. 275, that to show that a wife had to leave her husband for cause does not make out a case of abandonment by the husband, under statute providing "for the relief and support of married women, when deserted by their husbands," etc.; see also Milbourne v. State (1903) 161 Ind. 364, 68 N. E. 684, where the Stanbrough Case is commented upon, and the word "abandon" in a similar statute construed as meaning a physical and not a constructive abandonment.

Where a husband's offer of a home is insincere and fraudulent, with a view to evade the statute, the wife's refusal to accept the offer is no defense to a prosecution for abandonment and failure to support. People v. Frederick (1894) 78 Hun, 36, 9 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 214, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1002, affirmed in (1894) 143 N. Y. 667, 39 N.

E. 21; People v. Paaschen (N. Y.) supra; Jenness v. State (1899) 103 Wis. 553, 79 N. W. 759; Baskins v. State (1914) 75 Tex. Crim. Rep. 537, 171 S. W. 723.

It is held in Draper v. Com. (1913) 115 Va. 941, 79 S. E. 322, that it is no defense to a prosecution for nonsupport that the wife, after separation because of the husband's misconduct, took service and supported herself.

II. Husband's right to select home.

It was stated in People ex rel. Douglass v. Naehr (1883) 30 Hun (N. Y.) 461, that a husband could not be adjudged a disorderly person in that he neglected and refused to support his wife, within the meaning of the statute (Act of 1871, as amended 1882), where, because of a quarrel, she left him to reside with a daughter in another city, having refused his offer to provide her a separate house in the city she left. The court observed that the wife is entitled to reasonable support; it is her duty, as well as right, to live with him in such proper place as he provides; he is entitled to determine not only the place, but their style of living, and it is her plain duty to follow him wherever his interest, necessity, or reasonable wish may lead; it is only when he neglects her, or refuses to properly provide, or maltreats her, or is guilty of infidelity to her, that she is justified in refusing her submission to his reasonable requirements in this respect. It is difficult to find in the act anything more than authority for a criminal proceeding against the husband who so unreasonably neglects or refuses to perform existing legal obligations towards his wife that she has become, or is likely to become, a public burden. Neither was this statute intended to apply to a case where a wife capriciously, and without cause, refuses to accept reasonable provision for her support at the place which the husband may have selected, even though she is liable to become a public burden.

So, the court in People ex rel. Feeney v. Dershem (1903) 78 App. Div. 627, 79 N. Y. Supp. 612, refused to sustain a conviction under the statute, where the wife testified that her husband had offered to give her a flat "uptown," but that she did not take it, and was not willing to live with him. The court observed that the statute did not afford a civil remedy for the support of the wife, but was designed to prevent her from becoming a charge upon the public purse; that an essential fact to be established was the danger of such charge. "If," says the court, "it should appear upon the rehearing that the husband had in good faith offered to maintain his wife, who was unwilling to occupy a home with him, and that she had capriciously or unreasonably refused a fair provision for her keep, then he is without the purview of the statute. If, on the other hand, the offer was a mere formality, without good faith, or made under such conditions as assured its rejection, it would not, of course, shield him from the statute."

So, a conviction under the Support Statute as a disorderly person was not sustained in People v. Flewellyn (1908) 111 N. Y. Supp. 621, where a wife refused the husband's offer to support her in a place other than in the home of her parents, where he was staying, the court stating that it is the duty of a wife to go with her husband to the home which he provides, if that home is suitable for their station in life. It does not lie with the wife to say where that home shall be, and if the defendant in this case did not choose, for reasons of his own, to reside with his wife and support her while she was staying with her own people, then it was her duty to go with him to the place where he was willing to support her, and make a home for him, as well as to aid him in making a home for her.

III. Offer of home by husband.

Where a husband purposely abandoned his wife, but, before means left with her were exhausted, repeatedly requested her to come to him, offering to provide for her, a conviction was not sustained in State v. Greenup (1888) 30 Mo. App. 299, although good cause for the abandonment was not shown. The court said that had he persisted in his separation from her without soliciting her to return to him, and without providing her with additional means, the evidence would present a stronger appearance of a criminal abandonment and refusal of support; though, the cause of the abandonment remaining undisclosed, it would still be insufficient to sustain a conviction; but when he solicited her to return to him, promising good treatment, and even sent a messenger to bring her, he then put himself right before the law, even if wrong before, and her refusal to return to him, not adequately explained, puts her, and not him, in the wrong.

Where, however, one by letter offered to support his wife and child and furnish them transportation to the point where he was then at work, the letter, however, being silent as to the place where he required his wife to go, the court, in People v. Harris (1891) 38 N. Y. S. R. 316, 14 N. Y. Supp. 830, observed that it appeared to have been fairly a question for the magistrate to determine whether the letter was written in good faith, and with the intention to carry out the offer made, or whether it was written with a plan in view to bring himself within the rule laid down in the case of Lutes v. Shelley (1886) 40 Hun (N. Y.) 197, infra. In affirming a conviction of accused of being a disorderly person, in abandoning his family without providing means for their support, the court held the defense insincere, and not supported by trustworthy evidence.

So, a husband was held properly convicted of wife abandonment in People v. Paaschen (1918) 105 Misc. 417, 174 N. Y. Supp. 406, where the home offered to the wife by accused consisted of two rooms in a hotel, which were not in keeping with their station and standing in life. The court observed that had accused offered the complainant suitable rooms and support, unaccompanied by threats of a malicious nature, and under circumstances reasonable and fair, although they were not to her taste and wishes, it would have been her duty to go there. But the law never guarded "bad faith" to such an extent as to permit a husband to compel a wife to go where he would "get her," in order to accomplish some motive of his own. When the husband is guilty of infidelity to the wife, she is justified in not following him wherever his interest or necessity may lead.

So, under a statute providing punishment for one who, being of sufficient ability, unreasonably refuses or neglects to provide for his wife, a conviction was sustained in Jenness v. State (1899) 103 Wis. 553, 79 N. W. 759, where a husband, capable of earning sufficient to support himself and family, left his wife living with her father, and went to another state, after which, he testified, he wrote to her, asking her to come to him, but sent no money.

Where, in a prosecution for abandonment, accused relied upon his wife's misconduct as a defense, it was stated in Hopkins v. State (1905) 126 Wis. 104, 105 N. W. 223, that, the evidence tending to prove that they lived together eight years without his providing any house or home, an instruction to the effect that if the wife, "being offered a comfortable house by him," "without legal excuse," refused to live with him, then she forfeited her right to support, but not so as to the minor child or children, who were still entitled to maintenance and support from the father, was erroneous as misleading.

IV. Offer to provide home under another's roof.

In Foster v. People (1901) 101 Ill. App. 84, the court concluded that there was no abandonment without good cause within the meaning of the statute, where it was in evidence that the husband's father was able and willing and had offered to care for both his son and wife during her last sickness, but she clung to the natural desire to be with her brother, the court stating that while it was true that the husband neither provided for his wife at her brother's home, nor discharged his obligations to her, this alone would not be an abandonment of the wife, if it was the understanding between husband and wife that the husband, who was poor and without means, was not to remain as a charge upon the wife's brother, however much the brother might have been imposed upon or deceived by the arrangement.

In holding a husband not guilty of being a disorderly person under statute, in that he neglected and refused to support his wife, the court, in People v. Kellogg (1919) — Mich. —, 171 N. W. 410, stated that the test in such cases appears to be whether such a case is established as would entitle a third person to recover against the husband for necessities furnished the wife. During cohabitation the assent of the husband is presumed; but, if they are living apart, the burden is upon the person furnishing the necessities to show that the circumstances are such as to render the husband liable. "Measured by this test, we think counsel's point is well taken that a case was not made for the jury. It was stated by defendant, and concurred in by the wife, that defendant had theretofore offered to support her and her child if she would return to his home. The wife makes no complaint that she was cruelly treated by either her husband or his parents. The wife's complaint, in substance, is that it was disagreeable to remain in the home with the old people. The reasons given for this are a series of disagreeable remarks and little criticisms on the part of defendant's (husband's) mother and father, which were never serious enough to provoke a quarrel. The home was a large and commodious one, and defendant was an only child, who was assisting his father in the operation of the farm. No complaint is made against the defendant, except that on several occasions, when these annoyances were called to his attention by his wife, he approved of them. It could hardly be claimed that a showing no more serious than this would entitle one who had furnished the wife necessities while living separate from her husband, to have the question submitted

Where there was no evidence of a criminal intent to abandon and fail to support a wife, a conviction of wife abandonment under statute was not sustained in State v. Burton (1913) 171 Mo. App. 345, 157 S. W. 831, the wife having of her own accord left the temporary abode selected by her husband, with his parents, where they were apparently living together pleasantly; and the wife's complaint seeming to be that her husband went visiting without telling her of his going, and that, although she went away from home in his absence, and then, within a week, replevied the furniture given both of them by his father, still it was the husband's duty to hunt her up, and not hers to say anything to him.

So, there was no breach of a bond given upon conviction of one as a disorderly person for neglecting to support his wife and children in People v. Pettit (1878) 74 N. Y. 320, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 56, where the husband offered the wife a home in the house of his parents, which she declined to accept for the reason that the parents were disagreeable, and the father intemperate and abusive, the court stating that the statute was designed to enforce actual physical support only, not to interfere with marital relations, and, when such support is tendered, there is much force in the position that the husband cannot be convicted in this quasi criminal proceeding for refusing or neglecting to furnish it.

So, under a statute punishing as a disorderly person one who abandons his wife, a conviction was, in Lutes v. Shelley (1886) 40 Hun (N. Y.) 197 (action on undertaking made upon conviction for failure to support wife), said to be unwarranted where the wife refused the husband's offer of a home in a family consisting of man, wife, and a son eighteen years of age in another county, although her reasons for not accepting the place offered were that she was in poor health; had lived in the city for many years; had no relatives or acquaintances in the county of the selected abode, and that no physician resided there. It is simply a question whether he remained a disorderly person within the meaning of the statute, after the undertaking was made, observed the court, which depends upon the continuance of his neglect to provide for his wife. It does not appear that their condition in life has been such heretofore, or that the means of the defendant are such now, as to characterize the place the husband offered to provide as unreasonable, or such as to shock the sense of propriety, or that to require the wife to live there would be harsh or cruel treatment in the sense which is applied to those terms in such relation. In this case, the husband's offer to support his wife in the home selected was apparently made in good faith.

Where, however, in a prosecution for wife abandonment and failure to support, the husband's defense was that his wife had declined his offer to support her at his father's house, he being unable to support her at any other place, the court in People v. Frederick (1894) 78 Hun, 36, 9 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 214, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1002, affirmed in (1894) 143 N. Y. 667, 39 N. E. 21, in affirming conviction, stated that whether the wife, after trying three times unsuccessfully to obtain admission to the house of accused's father, should have made another attempt, was, under the evidence, a question for the magistrate; that he could very well find, under the circumstances of the case, that accused's offer was insincere, and made with intent to evade the provisions of the statute.

So where, upon a trial for abandonment after seduction and marriage, the husband claimed that because he was only eighteen or nineteen years old he had to live with his parents, and had the right to require his wife to live there also, notwithstanding that his mother and other members of his parents' family treated her in such a way as to make it unendurable for her to live there, the court in Baskins v. State (1914) 75 Tex. Crim. Rep. 537, 171 S. W. 723, stated that there was a reasonable inference from his conduct and treatment of her, and failure and refusal to protect her and to provide for her, in connection with his mother's treatment of her, that such was part of his scheme to drive her away from him, and thereby abandon her and leave her, and by such cruelties and outrages make their living together insupportable, thereby leaving her and forcing her to leave him under the very terms of the statute; that he had no right to designate his father's and mother's home as his, and, under the circumstances shown in the records, to compel her to live there with him.

V. Duty of wife to offer to return.

Under a New York statute (1871) relating to persons who abandon or threaten to abandon their families in the county of Kings, it was stated in People ex rel. Kehlbeck v. Walsh (1877) 11 Hun (N. Y.) 292, that to sustain a conviction the abandonment must be such as to leave the wife without adequate support, and a burden on the public. In this case there was no abandonment of a wife by her husband, but merely a refusal to support her away from his home, and a desire that her abandonment of him should continue, where she went to his place of employment, requested of him support, and he ordered her away, disowning her, the court stating that it was her duty to offer to return and live with him, under circumstances showing her willingness to discharge her duties as a wife, and then a rejection of such offer by him might be deemed an abandonment. See also People v. Kellogg (1919) — Mich. —, 171 N. W. 410; State v. Greenup (1888) 30 Mo. App. 299; Com. v. Wylukus (1895) 8 Kulp (Pa.) 137.

VI. Sufficiency of cause for leaving husband.

It is stated in the syllabus of State v. Baurens (1906) 117 La. 136, 41 So. 442, that it is the duty of the husband to provide for the support of his wife, who is in necessitous circumstances, at the matrimonial domicile, and that obligation is not discharged if, by reason of his cruel treatment, the wife is compelled to find shelter with her minor children, at the residence of her father in a neighboring parish.

In People ex rel. Scherer v. Walsh (1884) 33 Hun (N. Y.) 345, certiorari to review a decision of a police justice in a proceeding by wife against husband for abandonment and refusal to support, the court stated that there is no rule of law requiring a wife to remain under the roof of a brute, in constant danger of life and limb, under pain of starvation. It was, therefore, competent for the relator [wife] to show that she had reasonable cause to leave the house where she was in imminent danger of suffering personal violence at the hands of her husband. If this testimony had been received, the offense of which the accused was charged would have been clearly made out under the statute.

In Com. v. Dean (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 641, against the objection that there was an omission to set forth a desertion by the husband, in accordance with the statute, an order for support was sustained, upon the wife showing that her husband had abused her in such a manner that she was compelled to leave him, and had since failed and refused to contribute anything to her support, the court observing that, as to the purpose of the statute, treatment by the husband which justified the wife in leaving him is equivalent to desertion on his part, and gives her the same right of support that she would have if he deserted her.

In Com. v. Wylukus (1895) 8 Kulp (Pa.) 137, however, the charge of desertion against the husband consisted, not in his having actually left his wife, but in having in effect separated himself from her without reasonable cause, by means either of cruel and barbarous treatment endangering her life, or by offering such indignities to her person as to render her condition intolerable and life burdensome, and thereby forcing her to withdraw from his house and family. The rule in such case, observes the court, is that the causes which will justify a wife in withdrawing from the home of her husband must be such as to entitle her to a divorce. Here, the husband was able and willing to provide for his wife if she came and lived with him, but he declined to associate with certain of their neighbors, who, he alleged, were the cause of domestic difficulties between them. In dismissing a prosecution for desertion the court stated that the facts did not warrant the wife in entirely and permanently withdrawing from her home, or justify her in refusing to return to him after his offer to receive and care for her.

So, a conviction for wife abandonment was not sustained in State v. Brinkman (1890) 40 Mo. App. 284, where the wife left the husband while he was at work, without notice or warning to him of her intention, the only excuse by her for such conduct being that he refused to pay his bills. The court observed that the state failed to show by satisfactory proof that the husband, with criminal intent, abandoned his wife without a good cause; the reasons assigned by her for leaving her house were insufficient to justify her in the course pursued.

So, where a husband took his wife to live with his parents, but because of a quarrel with his mother she left the same day, going to her father, where she was cared for as a member of the family in the same manner that she had been cared for prior to the marriage, the evidence was, in Verse v. State (1917) —Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 193 S. W. 303, said to be insufficient to sustain a conviction for wife desertion, under a statute making a husband's wilful desertion of a wife in destitute or necessitous circumstances a misdemeanor, the evidence not showing a wilful desertion on the part of the husband, nor that the wife was in necessitous circumstances.

claimed to have been omitted by accused were that he, knowing of the departure of his wife and son from his house at a time when the temperature was 37 degrees below zero, did not follow them and see that they did not suffer death or grievous bodily harm from exposure. Accused testified that the reason he did not follow them was that he had learned from experience that when his wife became cranky the best thing to do was to leave her alone, as it only aggravated her the more to follow her and seek to persuade her to return. It was held that the husband was not criminally liable where the wife, having the exercise of free will, chose to leave the shelter provided for her by her husband and to go out into the cold, where she was frozen to death.

It is stated in State v. Bruening (1894) 60 Mo. App. 51, that the statute contemplates an actual abandonment without cause, and not a constructive desertion, as where a husband refused to take his wife back or support her after she left him without cause.

But in Com. v. Boetcher (1890) 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 544, it was held that a husband could be prosecuted for his refusal to support his wife where, within a year and a half, she repented and showed a disposition to return, but he refused to receive her, the court stating that, even if she went away originally with a view not to return, the law allowed her two years as a locus penitentiae. CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County in favor of defendant Hildreth, in part only, in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due on a contract for the purchase of bank stock, defendant appealing from so much of the judgment as held him liable, and plaintiffs and the defendant bank appealing from so much as found in favor of defendant Hildreth. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Flansburg & Flansburg, for defendant Hildreth:

Where all parties to a contract are engaged in its performance, with full knowledge of its terms, and before any controversy has arisen as to its meaning a practical construction is put upon it by the parties themselves, such construction will be enforced by the courts, in subsequent litigation between them.

Where a guaranty is executed independent of the note and, after the note is signed, delivered to and accepted by the payee, the consideration moving to the maker of the note is not sufficient to support the guaranty; and the guaranty, being collateral, is not binding on the guarantor unless there is a new and independent consideration for such a guaranty.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought in the district court for Lancaster county by Amos A. Galt and Reuben P. Galt against Carson Hildreth and the Franklin State Bank, to recover a balance alleged to be due on the following contract: "Carson Hildreth hereby gives the parties of the second part the privilege on January 1, 1913, of selecting notes to the value of $3,000 out of the notes on hand belonging to the bank in the regular loans and discounts on November 10, 1911, and the said Carson Hildreth agrees to pay the bank the face value with accrued interest from November 10, 1911, to January 1, 1913, on said notes. It is further agreed that, if the net profits of the bank for the calendar year 1912 shall not equal $8,000, after allowing salaries to the amount of $3,600, the said Carson Hildreth shall make good to the said second parties three fifths of the amount of the deficiency; but if the net profits of the bank exceed $8,000, then the second parties agree to pay to the said Carson Hildreth one half of the three fifths of said excess. It is further agreed that the said Carson Hildreth is to be retained as president of the said bank at a salary of $50 per month to the end of the calendar year 1912."

leged that the liability of Hildreth was to make good three fifths of the deficit in the net profits of the bank for the year 1912, which was alleged to be $5,000. The plaintiffs further alleged that they had selected certain notes, among which was a note made by one Curtis to the bank for $2,100, which they insisted Hildreth should pay to the bank, and, in order that a recovery might be had in the suit, the Franklin State Bank was named as a party defendant.

To the amended petition the bank filed an answer and cross petition, by which it adopted the contract between the Galts and Hildreth, which provided for the selection by the Galts of $3,000 out of the notes on hand belonging to the bank in the regular loans and discounts on November 10, 1911, and which Hildreth, by his contract, agreed to pay, with accrued interest from November 10, 1911, to January 1, 1913.

The cross petition alleged that only $514.70 was paid on March 12, and $502.50 on February 5, 1913, on the Curtis note, leaving due the bank $2,301.17 with interest from January 1, 1913, at 7 per cent per annum. Hildreth by his answer alleged that he paid $514.70 on March 12, 1912, and later on, in a settlement of the Curtis matters with the bank, he took up the note for $2,100, and a note for $152.50, which notes had been selected by plaintiffs under the contract, making in all a payment of $2,767.20, leaving a balance only of $232.80, and that plaintiffs had not selected any note of that amount, but, when so selected, Hildreth by his answer alleged he would pay the same under the contract. By his answer to the bank's first cause of action, Hildreth alleged that the bank had settled with him in relation to the Curtis transaction. He alleged that the title to the Curtis land was taken to himself for the benefit of the bank to secure the debt of $2,100; that the directors of the bank met on or about February 5, 1913, and agreed to exchange the Curtis land of 280 acres, free and clear of encumbrances, with one Deichen, for a mortgage of $5,000 of said Curtis land to be executed by Deichen to the bank, and a transfer to the bank of the 160 acres of land owned by Deichen at an agreed valuation of $7,000, with a $1,000 mortgage thereon. Hildreth further alleged that he had made advances on account of the Curtis matters, which he estimated at $1,576.46, without interest, and which did not include his personal expenses, admitted that he had received some rents from the Curtis farm, and alleged that it was finally by the directors agreed that he should receive $1,500 for his claim out of the profits of the transaction, and in order to obtain possession of the two Curtis notes, which plaintiffs had requested him to pay to the bank, he paid $502.50 to the bank in settlement of the balance of its claim against Curtis; that the aggregate of its claim, without interest, amounted to $11,502.50; that the proceeds of the Deichen transaction yielded the bank $11,000; that said transaction was completed, and that he paid the bank $502.50 in full settlement of the Curtis account, receiving $1,500 out of the profits from the bank, and thereupon conveyed the premises at the request of the bank to Deichen, and received the Curtis notes for $2,100 and $152.50 uncanceled, while at the same time all of the other Curtis notes were canceled and paid, and the Curtis land which had secured their payment was transferred by him to Deichen; that the settlement was full and complete so far as all of the Curtis notes were concerned.

It was alleged in the cross petition of the bank that Hildreth, in June, 1909, had guaranteed the payment of the Curtis notes at the time he sold certain of the bank stock to other individuals. As to that guaranty, Hildreth alleged that he had agreed that if any loss accrued to the stockholders on account of such notes he would make their share good to them without loss. He further alleged that at the settlement of the Curtis matter it was estimated that the bank would suffer a loss of $1,000, and that he paid to the stockholders, to whom his guaranty was made, that sum in settlement of their demand.

By the bank's cross petition it sought to recover from defendant Hildreth for and on account of a note for the sum of $887.75, due July 6, 1904, with interest, which was signed by Carson Hildreth, W. H. Chaney, and Thomas Gettle. It was alleged that Hildreth, in violation of his duty, failed to pay that note, but instituted a suit by the bank thereon, causing himself to be sued, together with the other makers, that Gettle and Chaney answered separately for themselves, denying their liability, and setting up as defenses to the action that the note was executed by them without consideration, and, further, that they had been released and discharged by the defendant, subject to the execution thereof, from all liability thereon. Upon trial, a verdict of the jury was rendered without special findings in their favor, and judgment was rendered thereon by the court. It is further alleged that defendant Hildreth prosecuted an appeal to the supreme court from that judgment, where the same was affirmed; that Hildreth did not answer in that action, but was in default, and therefore the judgment in that case did not release him from his liability for the payment on said note. Answering this cause of action, Hildreth denied that the bank had loaned him any money; admitted the execution of the note; admitted the guaranty indorsed by Gettle, Chaney, Doherty, and Hildreth; admitted the bringing of the suit in Franklin county in which the liability of Gettle, Doherty, Chaney, and Hildreth was alleged to be that of joint makers; admitted that Doherty, Gettle, and Chaney filed answers; admitted the execution and delivery of said note, but alleged that the Franklin

State Bank and the other defendants had been interested as creditors in the management of a brickyard which was turned over to them, the bank to the extent of $1,000, Gettle, $500, Chaney, $200, and Doher, $200, secured by chattel mortgages which were superior to that of the bank; that it was agreed that the mortgages should be released, which was done, the bank agreeing to operate said property and pay the claim of the bank and the other creditors pro rata out of the profits. The answer alleged that the Franklin State Bank requested defendants to sign the note in suit as evidence of its interest in said property, and for its convenience; that it was also agreed that said note was of no force or effect except for the convenience of said bank in carrying its interest in said property on its books as a resource expressed in an item as a promissory note, rather than as a resource in an item of personal property; that the defendants received no money or credit, nor did any consideration whatever move from the plaintiff bank to the defendants or anyone else for the same, and that the defendants received no benefit or consideration for signing said note.

There was a further plea of the Statute of Limitation. Replies were filed denying the allegations of the answer, and it was stipulated that the cause should be tried to the court on those issues. A trial was had, and the court by its decree found all of the issues in favor of defendant Carson Hildreth, and against the bank upon all causes of action set out in its cross petition, "other than the right of said bank to compel specific performance of the condition of said contract for the payment by said Hildreth of certain promissory notes owned by said bank November 10, 1911, and to be designated by plaintiffs. The court finds that said plaintiffs designated the notes of C. P. Curtis, $2,100, F. T. Burnham, $500, and Clement Chase, $500, of which the $500 Chase note has been by said Carson Hildreth duly paid; and that said bank, as to the $2,100 Curtis note, has by its own act placed it beyond its power to enforce collection thereof. The court finds that it is the right of the plaintiffs to designate $2,500 of notes, including the $500 Burnham note, owned by said bank on November 10, 1911, within twenty days from the entry of this decree, and, upon failure of said Carson Hildreth to pay notes so selected by plaintiffs to the said bank, in the amount of $2,500, with interest thereon from November 10, 1911, within forty days from the date of this decree, then defendant Franklin State Bank shall have judgment against said Carson Hildreth for said amount. The court further finds that, by the terms of the contract hereinbefore mentioned, the defendant, Carson Hildreth, agreed to pay said plaintiffs three fifths of any deficiency in the net earnings of said bank for the year 1912, under the sum of $8,000. The court finds that the net earnings, as aforesaid, amounted to the sum of $5,562.10, and that plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant Carson Hildreth, on account of such deficit, the sum of $1,607.78." Judgment was entered on the findings, from which Hildreth appeals. Cross appeals were likewise taken by the Galts and the bank from the decree which found in favor of Hildreth on the other issues.

The cross appellants, Galt and the Franklin State Bank, each complain of the finding and decree of the trial court that Hildreth was not liable as guarantor for the payment of the Curtis notes. They contend that the finding on that question is not sustained by the evidence. The record discloses that in 1909 Hildreth was the owner of the majority of the stock of the bank; in fact, was the owner of the bank. At that time the bank had among its assets the note of C. P. Curtis for $2,100, secured by mortgage on his 280-acre farm. Hildreth had indorsed the note or guaranteed its payment.

Curtis was largely indebted to other persons, and as a matter of precaution he was induced to make a deed of the farm to Hildreth, in order to prevent other creditors from obtaining liens thereon. Hildreth took the title to hold for the benefit of the bank. Certain persons had purchased some stock in the bank, and Hildreth at that time guaranteed that he would make good any loss they might sustain by reason of the transaction. In November, 1911, the Galts purchased a majority of the stock of the bank, and obtained from Hildreth the guaranty and agreement which is set out in the first part of this opinion. The Galts then took possession of the bank, and thereafter, with the directors, conducted its business. A short time before the meeting of the directors, which was held in February, 1913, an opportunity occurred for the bank to exchange the 280 acres of land, the title to which was held by Hildreth, with one Deichen, for 160 acres of land owned by him, on which there was a mortgage for $1,000, and obtain the difference in value between the two tracts. Curtis and one Mahin, his attorney, went to Franklin, and the exchange was made. Hildreth, acting for the bank, conveyed the 280-acre farm to Deichen, and he executed a mortgage thereon for $5,000 in favor of the bank. The Deichen land was conveyed to the bank at the agreed value of $7,000, there still being a mortgage on the land for $1,000. In order to even up the values, Curtis executed a note for $2,000 to Mahin, which Hildreth guaranteed. When the directors of the bank met on February 3, 1913, the matter of the Curtis deal came up for consideration. The evidence shows that the transaction was approved and adopted. The value of the Curtis land was agreed to be $11,500. Hildreth gave the bank his check for $502.50, and surrendered all claims on the Curtis land, and was exonerated from all charges as to rents which he might have collected while he had possession of it. He was allowed $1,500 for advances made by him on account of the transaction, and the whole matter was closed up. The minutes of the meeting are as follows:

Special Directors' Meeting, February 3, 1913.

Meeting held to consider a proposition to trade the farm belonging to the bank near Gaylord, Kansas, to Mr. Deichen for his 160-acre farm near Reamsville, Kansas. It was voted to make the trade along the lines outlined in the option given by Mr. Deichen to the bank.

(Signed) R. P. Galt, Secy.

The old notes were then canceled, with the exception of the Curtis note for $2,100, and the small note for $152.50. Those notes were not canceled, and Hildreth took possession of them without objections by anyone. Hildreth testified to the foregoing facts, and his evidence was corroborated by the testimony of the directors, and in part by the Galts themselves. We are therefore of opinion that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court on that issue.

Appellant Hildreth contends that the court erred in allowing the cross appellants to select notes, other than the Curtis notes, to the amount of $3,000, and require him to pay the same. On this question it may be said that the contract hereinbefore referred to does not mention any particular notes. It is an agreement on Hildreth's part to pay notes held by the bank on January 1, 1912, to the amount of $3,000, with interest thereon. The Curtis notes having been paid in the manner above stated, the Galts were at liberty to select other notes to the amount which Hildreth had agreed to pay. We are therefore of opinion that the court was right in its judgment on that question.

Hildreth also contends that in estimating the net profits of the bank for the year 1912 the court erred in deducting the sum of $723.06, which was the guaranty fund charged by the state against the bank under the existing banking laws. This sum was required to be set apart and segregated from the funds of the bank. The bank held it as a reserve fund for the payment of assessments under the provisions of the law, the state requiring it to be kept on hand at all times subject to call. This being so, we are unable to say that it was error for the court to deduct that amount from the profits of the bank. The parties on both sides are strenuous in their contentions as to the question of what should be considered as net profits for the year 1912, but, after considering all of their claims and the evidence contained in the record, we have concluded to adopt the finding of the trial court on that question.

This brings us to the consideration of the question of the liability of Hildreth to pay the bank the disputed items of the so-called brickyard notes.

It appears that the bank commenced an action on one of the brickyard notes, making Hildreth and all of the other joint makers defendants. The other defendants filed answers setting up as their defenses that there was no cause for the note; that the bank had taken over the brickyard and had conducted it for a time; that the enterprise had failed, and the bank had made certain payments on the notes out of the profits of the transaction, and therefore they were relieved from liability on the note. Hildreth filed no answer, but gave testimony on the trial which, if believed by the jury, would have authorized a judgment in favor of the bank. The jury found for the defendants, and judgment was rendered in their favor on the verdict. The bank appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. Franklin State Bank v. Chaney, 94 Neb. 1, 142 N. W. 537. The bank then brought another action on one of the notes against another of the signers, and the same defense was pleaded. The jury found for the defendants, and judgment was rendered on the verdict. The bank appealed, and again the judgment was affirmed. Franklin State Bank v. Gettle, 96 Neb. 60, 146 N. W. 1017.

It is contended by the bank that the judgment in those cases did not release Hildreth's liability on the notes, because he did not answer in those cases. There is some conflict in the authorities, but in Chase v. Miles, 43 Neb. 686, 62 N. W. 35, it was said: "A judgment rendered by a court which had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, as between such parties, conclusively settled all questions litigated."

In Upton v. Betts, 59 Neb. 724, 82 N. W. 19, it was held: "A matter in issue, covered, either generally or specifically, by the decree of the court, cannot be again litigated without a modification or vacation of that decree."

In the cases of the bank against Hildreth and others, no judgment was rendered against him. If Hildreth was an indorser and guarantor, that is, if he was an indorser with enlarged liability, the bank could not now sue him because the judgment—in favor of some obligors—effect.
prior and subsequent indorsers were released by the jury and the judgments of the court in the actions on these notes. We are therefore of opinion that the district court was right in holding that the bank was not entitled to a judgment for the balance of the brickyard notes.

Without further discussion of the issues involved in this suit, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

A motion for rehearing having been granted, the following Per Curiam response was handed down on December 9, 1916 (100 Neb. 422, 160 N. W. 870):

This is a hearing upon questions presented in motions for rehearing. The issues and the evidence are stated in the first opinion. Galt v. Hildreth, 100 Neb. 15, ante, 114, 158 N. W. 366. At the time the plaintiffs purchased from defendant Hildreth a controlling interest in the Franklin State Bank, he guaranteed that if the net profits of the bank for the year 1912 should not be $8,000 he would pay plaintiffs three fifths of the difference between that sum and the net profits. He also agreed that plaintiffs might select notes in the bank of the face value of $3,000, and that he would pay the same to the bank.

The Galts brought this action against Hildreth to recover three fifths of the difference between the actual profits and the guaranteed profit. The bank was made a party defendant, and filed a cross petition, in which it sought to enforce against Hildreth his liability upon the note clause of the contract, and also sought to collect from him the amounts due on notes alleged to have been made, indorsed, and guaranteed by him. The trial court found that there was due from Hildreth to plaintiffs upon the profit clause of the contract, $1,607.78. This was affirmed by this court, and is adhered to, except that plaintiffs should have interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from January 1, 1913.

The remaining questions relate to the causes of action pleaded in the bank's cross petition against Hildreth. The contract between plaintiffs and Hildreth provided that plaintiffs should have the right to select notes of the face value of $3,000, and Hildreth agreed to pay to the bank "the face value with accrued interest from November 10, 1911, to January 1, 1913, on said notes." Hildreth contends that the recovery allowed upon this clause of the contract is excessive. The evidence shows that March 12, 1912, Hildreth paid a note of $500. This would leave notes of the face value of $2,500 to be selected. In the settlement of the matters relating to the Curtis land, Hildreth gave his check for $502.50, and it was agreed that this should apply upon his liability under the note clause of the contract. The cross petition of the bank alleges that there was due under the note clause the sum of $2,301.17, and prayed judgment for such sum, "with interest thereon from January 1, 1913, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum." The district court decreed that plaintiffs should select notes of the face value of $2,500, and that, in case Hildreth failed to pay the same within forty days, the bank should have judgment against him for $2,500, with interest thereon from November 10, 1911. This was error. The decree should have been for $2,301.17, <sup>Pleading—</sup>claim—excessive <sup>judgment.</sup> with interest at 7 per cent per annum from January 1, 1913.

It is also contended by the bank that the rule announced in the 5th paragraph of the syllabus in the former opinion is not applicable to the facts. It was held: "The defense successfully made by one of the signers and indorsers of a note, if not made on purely personal grounds, will bar a future action by the same plaintiff on the same obligation against another joint defendant." Galt v. Hildreth, 100 Neb. 15, ante, 114, 158 N. W. 366.

In its cross petition the bank seeks to recover upon the so-called "brickyard" notes, known as the "Chaney" note and the "Gettle" note. Hildreth was one of three makers of the Chaney note and one of four indorsers of the Gettle note. In former actions brought by the bank against all the makers and indorsers, judgments for all the defendants, except Hildreth, who made no answer, were affirmed in this court. Franklin State Bank v. Chaney, 94 Neb. 1, 142 N. W. 537; Franklin State Bank v. Gettle, 96 Neb. 60, 146 N. W. 1017. Hildreth filed no answer in those actions because he was representing the bank in the litigation, and was to be its principal witness. His default was entered. After the judgments for the answering defendants were affirmed, the bank moved for judgment against Hildreth upon the default. Hildreth obtained leave of court to file an answer pleading the judgment in favor of his comakers and coindorsers as an adjudication in bar of the bank's claims. The second and third causes of action set forth in the bank's cross petition in the present case are upon the notes involved in the two cases mentioned. Upon the trial of the present case it was stipulated that the original actions upon the brickyard notes should be consolidated with this case. The bank contends that the judgments in those actions are not conclusive of Hildreth's nonliability, because it does not appear that the judgments were founded upon a defense that was not personal to the prevailing defendants. One defense pleaded was that the notes were delivered to the bank merely to evidence its interest in the brickyard property, it having released its claim thereto, and that the notes were without consideration and were never intended to be enforced. The other defense was that, after the delivery of the notes, the makers and indorsers surrendered to the bank: all claim to the brickyard property, and that the bank thereupon released them from any and all liability upon the notes. Ibid.

fense upon the merits, and was not a defense personal to the pleaders. If the first defense was established, there was never any liability upon the notes. If the notes were delivered merely to evidence the interest of the bank in the property, and with the understanding that they were not to be enforced, there was no liability either on the part of Hildreth or the other makers and indorsers. If the plea of release was established, all the makers and indorsers were released. If the brickyard property was surrendered to the bank in consideration of the release of the defendants in the actions on the notes, it was a satisfaction and payment. The release of those makers and indorsers also released Hildreth. Scofield v. Clark, 48 Neb. 711, 67 N. W. 754; Huber Mfg. Co. v. Silvers, 85 Neb. 760, 133 Am. St. Rep. 689, 124 N. W. 148.

It is also contended that Hildreth is estopped to plead his nonliability on the notes, because at the time the Galts purchased stock in the bank its records indicated that he was liable thereon, and that he so represented. The action upon the notes is brought by the bank. This is not an action by the Galts to recover for misrepresentation in the sale of the stock. Facts constituting an estoppel operating in favor of the bank were neither pleaded nor proved.

in favor of stranger to suit—effect.

It follows that the former adjudications released Hildreth from liability on the brickyard notes.

Except as herein modified, the judgment of affirmance is adhered to.

Former opinion modified.

ANNOTATION.

Judgment in favor of less than all parties to contract as bar to action against other parties.

- I. Introductory, 124.
- II. View that judgment is bar, 124.
- III. View that judgment is not bar, 125.

I. Introductory.

This note, in discussing the effect of a judgment in favor of less than all of the parties to a contract as a bar to a subsequent action against the other parties, is confined to a discussion of the effect of such a judgment as an adjudication or estoppel. The effect of the adjudication, considered merely as a release of one of the parties to a joint obligation, is not included.

The effect of a judgment against less than all of the parties to a contract, as a bar to an action against the other parties, is discussed in the note in 1 A.L.R. 1601.

* II. View that judgment is bar.

In some jurisdictions it is held that, if an action is brought against less than all of the parties to a contract and a judgment is rendered in their favor, it is available as an adjudication of the merits in favor of the other parties to the contract, and bars an action against them for the same cause of action. Taylor v. Sartorius (1908) 130 Mo. App. 23, 108 S. W. 1089; Townsend v. Riddle (1822) 2 N. H. 448; Reynolds v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1876) 29 Ohio St. 602; Brown v. Johnson (1857) 13 Gratt. (Va.) 644; Spencer v. Dearth (1870) 43 Vt. 98. See dictum in Hill v. Morse (1873) 61 Me. 541. And see the reported case (GALT v. HILDRETH, ante, 114).

In Brown v. Johnson (1857) 13 Gratt. (Va.) 644, it was held that a judgment on the merits in favor of one joint obligor on a bond was conclusive in favor of the other, the court saying: "If a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff against one of several who are jointly bound may be admitted in evidence in an action against another as a bar, it would seem to be a necessary corollary (if the deduction be not a fortiori) that a verdict and judgment against the plaintiff in the former action, upon an issue going to the merits and ascertaining that the plaintiff never had any cause of action against that defendant, would be admissible as a bar to a subsequent action against another so jointly bound."

In Taylor v. Sartorius (1908) 130 Mo. App. 23, 108 S. W. 1089, it appeared that an action was brought against some members of a partnership on a firm contract, and the defendants had judgment therein. It was held that this judgment barred an action against the other partners, the court saying: "If respondent recovers from appellant, the latter might recover contribution from her cosigners, thereby nullifying the verdict given in their favor in respondent's suit against them."

In Spencer v. Dearth (1870) 43 Vt. 98, a judgment in favor of a surety on a note on a plea of payment was held to be conclusive in an action against the principal maker. The court said: "A rule that would not allow a judgment in favor of one of the makers of the note, upon such defense, as a legal bar to a recovery against another maker of the same note, would compel each maker of the note, in a suit subsequently tried against him, to litigate the same question or questions which had been adjudicated in the former suit or suits, irrespective of the former adjudication or its result, by which the plaintiff would have had the advantage of two or more trials in different suits, but of the same matter, and if he should finally prevail against one of such makers he would have had only one trial and judgment upon the matters involved."

In Reynolds v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1876) 29 Ohio St. 602, it appeared that a joint contract for the carriage of goods was made by two railroad companies. The shipper sued one of them for a breach, and the defendant had judgment. It was held that the adjudication barred a subsequent action against both.

In Townsend v. Riddle (1822) 2 N. H. 448, a judgment in favor of one of two makers of a joint and several note was held to bar an action against the other.

But if the defense is one personal to the party first sued, the judgment in his favor does not inure to his co-obligors. Rocky Mount Loan & T. Co. v. Price (1904) 103 Va. 298, 49 S. E. 73. In that case it appeared that one joint obligor, sued separately, prevailed on a plea of non est factum. The court said: "The rights of the obligee and the liability of the other obligors were not affected by the fact that the name of one of the obligors may have been forged. The plea of non est factum bars the action only as to him who pleads it, and does not affect the liability of the other defendants in a case like this."

So, in Hill v. Morse (1873) 61 Me. 541, it was held that a person seeking the benefit of a judgment in favor of a co-obligor must show that it was rendered on grounds which were not personal to the then defendant. The court said: "There is no doubt that if any fact was necessarily decided for the defendant in the former suit, which would be as well a defense to this defendant, that the plaintiff in this suit, when it is shown, would be estopped by it. But while it appears in this case that the former action was tried upon the plea of the general issue, it does not appear upon what ground of defense, under that plea, the verdict and judgment were rendered. There is no evidence introduced to show that the defendant prevailed upon any facts which went to the merits of the case, or were an extinguishment of the cause of action, or that the facts involved in that judgment were such as would be available to the defendant as a bar to this action if the same were proved here. Non constat, that the former defendant may not have prevailed upon some personal defense, such as infancy or many others allowable under the general issue, which could not be available to the present defendant." See to the same effect, Phillips v. Ward (1863) 2 Hurlst. & C. 717, 159 Eng. Reprint, 297, 33 L. J. Exch. N. S. 7, 9 Jur. N. S. 1182, 9 L. T. N. S. 345, 12 Week. Rep. 106.

III. View that judgment is not bar.

In several jurisdictions the view obtains that a judgment in favor of less than all of the parties to a contract does not bar an action against the others on the same cause of action. Larison v. Hager (1890) 44 Fed. 49; McLelland v. Ridgeway (1847) 12 Ala. 482; State Bank v. Robinson (1853) 13 Ark. 214; Owingsville & Mt. S. Turnp. Road Co. v. Hamilton (1899) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 815, 53 S. W. 5; Lindsay v. Gager (1896) 11 App. Div. 93, 42 N. Y. Supp. 851. And see Eastman v. Winship (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 44. Compare Hunt v. Terril (1831) 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 67; French v. Neal (1833) 24 Pick. (Mass.) 55.

In Larison v. Hager (1890) 44 Fed. 49, it appeared that a firm made a contract for the purchase of land. An action was brought thereon against all the partners, but only two were served. On the trial judgment was rendered for the defendants. In a subsequent action against another partner, it was held that the judgment was not available to him as a bar. The court said: "There is no privity between Hager and the defendants sued in the judgment pleaded by him in bar, so that he can take advantage of it. As a general rule a judgment will not operate as an estoppel unless the benefit derived from it is mutual; that is, a judgment cannot be used as evidence against a person when the opposite verdict would not have been evidence for him. In the record of the judgment pleaded by Hager the parties thereto are not the same as in this case, and he is not prejudiced, and can derive no advantage by it. If Larison had succeeded in the suit in Dakota, and obtained judgment against Wilbur and Nickeus, he could not enforce it against Hager, who was not within the jurisdiction, and was not served with process."

In McLelland v. Ridgeway (1847) 12 Ala. 482, it was held that a judgment in favor of one partner on a defense of payment did not work an estoppel in favor of the other partner.

In Owingsville & Mt. S. Turnp. Road Co. v. Hamilton (1899) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 815, 53 S. W. 5, it appeared that a contract with a turnpike company gave the use of the road toll free to the other party and his family. After the death of that party one of his children defeated an action for tolls on the ground that the contract inured to him and his brothers. It was held that the judgment did not bar a like action against another of the children.

In Lindsay v. Gager (1896) 11 App. Div. 93, 42 N. Y. Supp. 851, it appeared that a former employee of a firm sued the surviving partner to recover for services. The defendant recovered judgment. It was held that the judgment did not bar a claim against the estate of the deceased partner, the court saying: "I do not see how the individual liability of O. A. Gager could have been an issue in that action. The question there was whether the firm were liable."

In State Bank v. Robinson (1853) 13 Ark. 214, it was held that, where separate actions are brought against the principal and a surety on a bond, a judgment in favor of the principal is not available as a bar of the action against the surety.

In Eastman v. Winship (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 44, an action against the maker and two indorsers of a note, it was held that a third indorser was a competent witness, the court saying: "He will be still liable to the plaintiff, whether he recovers judgment against the defendants or not; and it is clear that the judgment in this suit cannot be given in evidence in an action against the witness."

But in Hunt v. Terril (1831) 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 67, it was held that a judgment in favor of one of the heirs of a warrantor of title was a bar to a subsequent action against another heir.

In French v. Neal (1834) 24 Pick. (Mass.) 55, it was held that a judgment for the defendant on the merits in an action against one of two joint contractors, the nonjoinder of the other not being pleaded in abatement, barred an action for the same cause against the two jointly. W. A. S.

JONES & COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

C. W. HANCOCK & SONS et al.

(117 Va. 511, 85 S. E. 460.)

Affidavit — verification — corporation — president as agent.

1. The mere fact that one signing an affidavit verifying a plea of a corporation is its president is not alone sufficient to establish agency, within the provisions of a statute requiring the affidavit of the corporation or its agent.

Pleading — amendment — when permitted.

2. After an office judgment entered upon a declaration and supporting affidavits has become final, the court is without power to admit evidence as a basis for amending the pleading so as to show a proper affidavit to the plea.

Writ — service on corporation — time.

3. Service upon the president in the county in which the suit was brought of process against the corporation need not be shown to have been ten days before the return day when the statute requires such service only when it is against an agent of the corporation or in a county or corporation other than that in which the action is brought.

ERROR to the Law and Chancery Court of the City of Norfolk to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the price of goods alleged to have been sold and delivered by them to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kenneth S. Jones and William H. Moreland for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Wingfield & Hoag for defendants in error.

Whittle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error, partners, who were plaintiffs below, brought an action of assumpsit against the plaintiff in error, a corporation, to recover the price of goods alleged to have been sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant at its request. The account was filed with the declaration, accompanied by the affidavit of one of the plaintiffs, made in accordance with § 3286 of the Code, and an office judgment duly entered thereon. At the succeeding term of the court, on June 17, 1914, the defendant appeared and filed pleas of non-assumpsit and set-off, whereupon the office judgment was set aside. These pleas were sworn to by the president of the corporation, but it does not appear that they were verified by any agent of the defendant as required by § 3286.

On July 13, 1914, the court, on motion of the plaintiff, struck out the pleas because they were not verified by such affidavits as the statute prescribed, and likewise sustained the plaintiffs' motion to annul its former order setting aside the office judgment.

It is quite clear under the decisions of this court that the affidavit of the president of the corporation, in the absence of any averment therein of his agency, or any other evidence on the subject, is not a sufficient compliance with the statute which requires the affidavit of the plaintiff or his agent to the plea.

In other words, the fact that affiant is president does not, per se, import such agency. Reference to decisions of this court on the subject obviates the necessity for further discussion. Merriman Co. v. Thomas, 103 Va. 24, 48 S. E. 490; Taylor v. Sutherlin-Meade Tobacco Co. 107 Va. 787, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 60 S. E. 132; Clement v. Adams Bros.-Paynes Co. 113 Va. 547, 75 S. E. 294.

The effect of the court's ruling in striking out the defendant's pleas was to reinstate the office judgment and by force of the statute, § 3237, it became final on July 1, 1914, which was the fifteenth day of the term. Grigg v. Dalsheimer, 88 Va. 508, 510, 13 S. E. 993; Price v. Marks, 103 Va. 18, 48 S. E. 499. After that time the court was without power to admit evidence as the basis for amending the pleadings, and rightly so held. Enders v. Burch, 15 Gratt. 64.

Objection was made to the service and return of the original summons in the case, because it did not show that it was served on an agent and ten days before the return day. Code, §§ 3225, 3227.

The record does show that the defendant is a corporation and that the writ was served on its president in the city of Norfolk where he resides. By § 3225, process against a corporation is required to be served on the president if he is in the county or corporation wherein the

action is brought. And by § 3227, process is only required to be served ten days before the return day when service is on an agent, or in a county or corporation other than that in which the action is brought.

In this instance, as observed, the service was not on an agent or in another county or corporation. Hence, service at any time before or on the return day was sufficient.

The remaining assignments are without merit and do not call for special notice.

The judgment of the Court of Law and Chancery of the city of Norfolk is plainly right and must be affirmed.

NOTE.

The necessity of showing the authority or qualifications of affiant in an affidavit made in behalf of a corporation is the subject of the annotation beginning at page 132. The view taken in the reported case (JONES & Co. v. HANCOCK, ante, 126), that the mere fact that one signing the affidavit is an officer of that corporation is not alone sufficient to establish his agency or authority to make the affidavit, is supported by other cases cited at page 134 of that annotation.

SUN INSURANCE OFFICE of London, England, Appt.

Affidavit — by agent — necessity of showing authority.

1. An affidavit of defense to an action on an insurance policy, made by the state agent of the insurance company, is insufficient, which fails to show why it was not made by an officer of the corporation, and that the agent had special knowledge of the facts, or information and belief, and expectation to be able to prove them.

Pleading — action on policy — affidavit of defense.

2. An affidavit of defense to an action on an insurance policy which merely states wilful overvaluation of the property insured, without stating any facts tending to support such averment, is insufficient.

— proofs of loss — satisfactory.

3. The mere statement in an affidavit of defense to an action on an insurance policy, that the proofs of loss were not satisfactory, is not sufficient where the statement avers the furnishing of proofs of loss agreeably to the terms of the policy.

Insurance — waiver of objection to proofs.

4. Delay for eight months in objecting to the proofs of loss under an insurance policy waives such objection.

Pleading — failure to produce books.

5. An affidavit of defense to an action on an insurance policy because of failure to produce books and papers is insufficient if they are not alleged to relate to the insurance involved.

— insurance — successive fires.

6. An affidavit of defense to an action on an insurance policy, setting up that a portion of the property was destroyed by a fire subsequent to that for which claim is made, is insufficient if the statement of claim avers that no claim was made for property destroyed by the second fire.

— based on idle gossip.

7. An affidavit of defense made by the state agent of an insurance company to an action on a policy of fire insurance setting up concealment of material facts concerning the value of the building, which was based simply on the idle gossip of the village, is insufficient.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Tioga County in favor of plaintiff, for want of sufficient affidavit of defense, in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Dunsmore & Edwards, for appellant:

Where an affidavit of defense is based upon information and belief of matters not within the knowledge of the affiant, the affiant must not only aver the information, but his belief in the truth of it, and his belief in his ability to prove the same at the trial of the cause.

Bank, 96 Pa. 139; Kaufman v. Cooper Iron Min. Co. 105 Pa. 542.

Messrs. Chester H. Ashton, Walter Sherwood, and Edward H. Owlett, for appellee:

The affidavit of defense is clearly insufficient.

Griel v. Buckius, 114 Pa. 190, 6 Atl. 153; Bushong v. Edwards, 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 376; Cummins v. German American Ins. Co. 197 Pa. 61, 46 Atl. 902.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment entered by the court below, for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, in an action on a policy of fire insurance on a building and its contents.

The affidavit avers substantially that: (1) The plaintiff concealed and misrepresented a material fact concerning the value of the building; (2) the plaintiff has not furnished satisfactory proofs of loss; (3) the plaintiff has refused and neglected to produce for examination, all books of accounts, bills, invoices, and other vouchers, at Knoxville; and (4) the property described in the policy was but partially destroyed January 11, 1912, and was further destroyed by a later fire, notice of which was not given to the defendant nor claim made for insurance under the contract.

1. The alleged misrepresentation and concealment is as to the value of the building; the affidavit averring that it was not of the value of $2,000, at which it was insured, and was not worth more than $1,500, and that plaintiff thereby obtained insurance in excess of that which he otherwise would have been able to secure had the defendant known the true value of the building, and therefore the policy is void. There are no facts stated in the affidavit from which the court could determine the truth of the alleged concealment and misrepresentation. The affidavit does not disclose what the plaintiff said, to whom the value was stated, nor when the misrepresentation was made. The concealment and misrepresentation are based on the fact that the building was insured for $2,000, and the defendant's allegation that the plaintiff knew it was not worth that amount. Why does the defendant's agent, making the affidavit, aver that the plaintiff knew the house was not of its insured value? He gives no facts from which the court or a jury could find the plaintiff had such knowledge. There is no averment in the affidavit of any declaration or act on the part of the plaintiff which discloses such knowledge. There is nothing in the affidavit to show that the house was not worth $2,000 when it was insured, or that the plaintiff knew or believed it was not of that value, save the simple declaration of the affiant, who does not aver that he has any knowledge of the value of the property, nor that he believes his statement to be true or expects to prove it. The building was in existence at the time it was insured; presumably was seen and examined by the defendant's agent, who had every opportunity to ascertain, and presumably did ascertain, its insurable value. In the absence of an averment of specific facts disclosing concealment and misrepresentation by the plaintiff as to the value of the house at the date of the insurance, the simple statement by the affiant that it was not of that value, and the plaintiff knew it, is not sufficient to prevent judgment.

policy—affidavit of defense.

2. The affidavit avers that the plaintiff has not furnished defendant satisfactory proofs of loss of the items of merchandise contained in the policy. The fire occurred on January 11, 1912, and the plaintiff's statement avers "that on February 1st the assured, W. O. Wakely, furnished the defendant company with a particular statement of said loss, under oath agreeable to the terms of said policy, and had previously notified defendant's agent at Elkland, Pennsylvania, of the fire on January 12, 1912."

The affidavit does not deny this averment, but simply alleges that the proofs were not satisfactory. It does not aver that they do not meet the requirements of the policy, which is specifically alleged in the statement. It does not specify wherein the proofs furnished are not satisfactory, nor does it aver that the defendant had suggested to the plaintiff that the proofs are unsatisfactory, or wherein they are not satisfactory. The proofs of loss were delivered to the defendant within the time stipulated in the policy, and, as we must assume, in good faith, as a compliance with the provisions of the policy, and it was the duty of the company to give immediate notice to the assured of its objection to the proofs, pointing out the defects, etc. (Gould v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 134 Pa. 570, 19 Am. St. Rep. 717, 19 Atl. 793); and, if the company neglected to do so, its silence will be held a waiver of such defects in the proof, and they must be considered as having been duly made according to the conditions of the policy (Girard L. Ins. Annuity & Trust Co. v. New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. 97 Pa. 15; Ætna F. Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. 385, 30 Am. Dec. 90). The first notice the plaintiff had that the proofs were not satisfactory, so far as the record discloses, was contained in the affidavit of defense filed eight months after the proofs were furnished. If they were defective or not in conformity with the policy, it was then too late to assert the fact.

Insurance—

3. The affiant further avers that, since the fire, the plaintiff has refused to produce for examination "all books of account, bills, invoices, and other vouchers, or certified copies thereof, if the originals be lost," whereby the policy became void. It is not averred that the books of account, etc., were necessary to enable the company to make a defense to an action on the policy. We must assume that the notice or request to produce the books, etc., was substantially in the language used in the affidavit, and, if so, it was entirely too indefinite to charge the plaintiff with neglect in declining to comply with the request. The affidavit does not aver that the books desired by the defendant and refused by the plaintiff related to the insurance out of which this controversy arises, and, under the well-settled rule, no such intentment can be made. We must assume that the affiant stated the case in his favor as strongly as he could, and therefore that he could not truthfully aver in the affidavit of defense that the books, etc., which the plaintiff refused to produce, were those relating to this insurance. The plaintiff was, of course, justified in declining to furnish any other books or papers for the defendant's inspection.

4. The fourth and last defense, as averred in the affidavit, is, that the property described in the policy "was not wholly destroyed on January 11, 1912, as alleged in the plaintiff's statement of claim, but was only partially destroyed at that date, and was further destroyed by a subsequent fire in the same premises, notice of which said subsequent fire was never given to the defendant by the said plaintiff, nor any claim made for insurance under said contract of said defendant," and that "defendant avers and expects to be able to prove that the amount of personal property burned (in the fire of January 11th) was not $3,792.11, as averred in the plaintiff's statement, but of a much less value, the exact amount of which affiant is unable to state." This averment is clearly defective. The statement of claim does not allege that the property was wholly destroyed by the fire of January 11th, which occasioned the loss sued for, but that "a fire occurred, totally destroying the buildings insured under said policy, and a large part of the merchandise covered by said policy was destroyed." The items of merchandise totally destroyed, and those which were damaged, but not totally destroyed, by the fire of January 11th, are set forth in the statement, and it is averred therein, and not denied in the affidavit of defense, that the defendant, by its state agent, A. D. Lundy, agreed to the estimated loss on the damaged goods. If it be conceded that there was a subsequent fire and it destroyed some of the merchandise insured, as affiant avers, it does not follow that the loss in the subsequent fire is claimed in this suit, but precisely the opposite inference arises, in view of the averment in the affidavit that notice of the subsequent fire was not given the defendant, nor any claim made for insurance under the policy. The defendant, therefore, is not injured, and sets up no legal defense to the claim in suit, if this averment of its affidavit be taken as verity. It should be observed that, except as attacked inferentially in this part of the affidavit of defense, the particular items of merchandise destroyed and the value thereof, as set out in the statement of claim, are not specifically challenged, and, as above suggested, the loss on the damaged, but not totally destroyed, items, is admitted by the defendant's agent. The general averment, therefore, that defendant expects to be able to prove that the personal property destroyed was worth much less than $3,792.11, does not sufficiently meet the positive and specific averment of the loss of the items set out in the statement.

The company's state agent, who makes the affidavit of defense, does not, so far as the affidavit discloses, do so on his personal knowledge of the matters therein averred, and he does not aver that the affidavit is made upon information, nor that he believes the loss caused by the fire is what he alleges. If he had such information, he does not disclose the fact nor its source, and if it were simply the idle gossip of the village, as it may be, so far as the affidavit shows, it would certainly not be a sufficient reason to warrant the court in refusing judgment.

The affidavit of defense is made by A. D. Lundy, who swears that "he is the state agent for the state of Pennsylvania," of the defendant corporation. He does not aver that he has personal knowledge of the alleged facts set out in the affidavit, nor that, as an officer of the company, his duties require him to have knowledge of such matters, but that it is his duty to make the affidavit of defense, "inasmuch as no officers of the company better able to do so are resident within the state of Pennsylvania." This may be true, and yet he may not be the proper officer to make the affidavit, nor have sufficient personal knowledge of the matters alleged to be a defense as would warrant the averment in the affidavit "that the said defendant has a full, just, and true defense to the whole of the plaintiff's claim." The affidavit avers that the affiant is the state agent of the corporation, but does not aver directly that he is an officer of the corporation, nor does the affidavit disclose that he, as an officer, is acquainted with the facts, and therefore could swear to them positively as of his own knowledge. If an affidavit is made by an agent of a corporation, it should aver why it is not made by an officer of the corporation (Citizens' Natu- ral Gas Co. v. Waynesburg Natural Gas Co. 210 Pa. 137, 59 Atl. 822), and the agent should show that he has special knowledge of the facts, if the affidavit is made from his personal knowledge, and not from information and belief. If a party making an affidavit does not have personal knowledge of the facts, the established form is for the affiant to aver that he is informed, believes, and expects to be able to prove them. In the case at bar the affiant does not disclose what knowledge, or opportunities for knowledge, he had of the matters set up in the affidavit, and in only one instance therein does he aver that he is informed, believes, and expects to be able to prove the alleged facts.

A careful examination of the affidavit of defense does not disclose a defense to the plaintiff's claim, and therefore the learned court below was right in making the rule absolute and entering judgment against the defendant. Judgment affirmed.

I. In general.

When an affidavit is required of a corporation there must be some showing that it is made on behalf of the corporation.

Thus, an affidavit made by the agent of a corporation, that an appeal bond executed by him, apparently on behalf of the corporation, was in fact executed by him without any right or authority from the corporation, was held to be insufficient, as the denial must appear to be the act of the corporation, or otherwise it might happen that a stranger would deny what was admitted by the real party in interest; and, therefore, the affidavit should show that the agent had authority from the company to make the denial. Barrett Min. Co. v. Tappan (1873) 2 Colo. 124.

In Phonoharp Co. v. Stobbe (1897) 20 Misc. 698, 46 N. Y. Supp. 678, it was held that a verification of the complaint in an action by a foreign corporation, which was signed by an individual, without purporting to be an officer or agent of the corporation, was a mere nullity.

In Orchard v. Smith (1917) — Mo. —, 193 S. W. 574, it was held that proceedings on behalf of a corporation, for bringing in the unknown heirs to the property in question, were insufficient, where the affidavit on behalf of the corporation was made by one who refrained from stating that he occupied any position charging him with the duty of ascertaining the names of such parties.

And in Silver Peak Mines v. Hanchett (1897) 80 Fed. 990, the court said that an affidavit for an attachment, which was headed: "Silver Peak Mine, a corporation, the plaintiff above named, by M. A. Murphy, its attorney, being duly sworn, says," was open to criticism, and that the form of the affidavit of the complaint, which was headed: "M. A. Murphy, being duly sworn on behalf of the plaintiff in the above-entitled action," was much better; but held that the point was clearly technical, and went simply to the form and not to the substance of the affidavit, the true interpretation being that the affidavit was that of the attorney for the corporation, which was sufficient.

In some cases, a showing that the affiant is an agent or officer of the corporation is regarded as a sufficient showing of authority to make the affidavit.

Thus, in International Seal Co. v. Beyer (1909) 33 App. D. C. 172, involving the sufficiency of the disclosure of a corporation as garnishee, the court said: "We think it may be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the secretary and treasurer of a corporation, who recites in the affidavit that he is secretary or treasurer, is acting for the corporation, and within the scope of his authority."

In Old Settlers Invest. Co. v. White (1910) 158 Cal. 236, 110 Pac. 922, it was held that where the statute makes no provision as to who shall make the affidavit when a corporation is a party to a chattel mortgage, and it does not require the person who makes it for the corporation to declare on oath his official position or relation, it is sufficient if the affiant is described as secretary of the corporation, in the introductory statement describing the person who made the affidavit.

In Fremont Cultivator Co. v. Fulton (1885) 103 Ind. 393, 3 N. E. 135, an affidavit for attachment by a corporation, which recited that affiant was its secretary, was held sufficient, as the recital was sufficient evidence, prima facie, that he was its secretary, and, being such secretary and making the affidavit as such, it will be presumed in the absence of anything to the contrary, that he made the affidavit in plaintiff's behalf, under a statute which does not require a sworn statement in the affidavit that affiant is agent, attorney, or officer of the plaintiff, and makes the affidavit in its behalf.

In Casavant & C. Co. v. Smith (1916) 115 Me. 168, 98 Atl. 577, under a statute prescribing that the oath required for the arrest of a debtor on civil process may be made by an agent or attorney of the creditor, where an affidavit was made for a corporation creditor by one who described himself in the affidavit as "clerk of the corporation, and its agent and manager," it was held that those words afford a presumption of authority to make the oath.

And an affidavit of account, in a suit in a justice's court, by a corporation, which stated that the affiant was the treasurer of the corporation, sufficiently showed his authority to make the affidavit. Forbes Lithograph Mfg. Co. v. Winter (1895) 107 Mich. 116, 64 N. W. 1053.

In Remington Sewing Mach. Co. v. Cushen (1880) 8 Mo. App. 528, where an objection was made to an affidavit in a replevin suit by a corporation, that the affiant was merely described as agent for plaintiff, the court said: "It is undoubtedly more correct that the fact of agency should be stated and sworn to, instead of being added thus by way of description, but the point is not jurisdictional."

In White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Betting (1893) 53 Mo. App. 260, in which it was held that a recital in an affidavit, that it was made by affiant "as agent of and in behalf of" a corporation, was sufficient, the court said: "The better reason and weight of authority make it sufficient, if it appear with reasonable certainty from the affidavit or any part of the record that the affiant acted as agent."

Where it was stated in the body of an affidavit for garnishment that the affiant was president of the corporation, and the affidavit was signed by him with the abbreviation "Pres." after it, the affidavit was sufficient. First Nat. Bank v. Graham (1889) — Tex. App. —, 22 S. W. 1101.

In Ex parte Sargeant (1845) 17 Vt. 426, where an affidavit for a body execution was objected to on the ground that there was no evidence that the person making it was president of the corporation, as he purported to be, the court said: "We have only to say, there is no evidence that he was not. The clerk who issued the execution must have been satisfied as to his authority; and it is at least prima facie to be taken that he was such officer, and so made it appear to the clerk issuing the execution."

III. View that authority must be shown.

Other cases hold that the authority of the officer or agent to make the affidavit on behalf of the corporation must appear, a mere showing that affiant is an officer or agent being insufficient.

In Alabama, the statute concerning garnishment provides that "no person shall answer on behalf of any corporation, any process of garnishment, unless he shall make affidavit that he is the duly authorized agent of the corporation to make such answer," and under such statute no valid judgment could be rendered against the corporation garnishee upon an answer by an agent which did not contain an affidavit of the agent's authority to make it, unless the answer was adopted or ratified by the corporation by some appropriate method. Decatur, C. & N. O. R. Co. v. Crass, and Hutson v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Ala.) supra.

In Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Dickerson (1914) 15 Ga. App. 293, 82 S. E. 942, it was held that an answer in a garnishment proceeding, purporting to be the answer of a corporation, made by its attorney and merely signed at the end by him as attorney at law for the corporation, was insufficient, as it must appear that the person making the answer for the corporation had authority to answer on its behalf, and to bind it by his answer, while the answer as made was nothing more than the mere answer of the attorney, the designation, "attorney at law," etc., being merely descriptio personæ.

In Mahone v. Manchester & L. R. Corp. (1872) 111 Mass. 72, the court, in holding that an affidavit for removal of a case to the Federal courts in which the affiant averred and said that he was the acting and assistant superintendent of the corporation was insufficient because it did not appear that he had authority to make the affidavit, said: "When, as in this case, the petitioner for removal is a corporation, the petition may doubtless be signed and the affidavit made by some person authorized to represent the corporation. But the authority of any person assuming to represent it must appear. No officer of a corporation, unless specially authorized, has power to bind the corporation, except in the discharge of his ordinary duties."

In Dodge v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. (1868) 13 Minn. 458, Gil. 427, the court expressed its doubt as to whether a corporation could bring itself within the requirements of an affidavit for the removal of a cause to a Federal court because of local prejudice, and held that at any rate the making of such an affidavit, not being ordinarily one of the powers or duties of the secretary of the corporation, in the absence of proof, the court had no right to presume that the affidavit was not made on his own motion, instead of by authority of the corporation.

In State v. Washoe County (1869) 5 Nev. 317, it was held that an affidavit on behalf of a railroad company, required by statute to be made by the "president, secretary, general superintendent, or managing agent of the corporation," in which the affiant was merely described as "John Corning of the Central Pacific Railroad Company," was insufficient in that it did not show that he was one of the persons competent to make it under the statute, as it should affirmatively appear that he was such person, and he should also swear to that fact.

In Quigley v. Central P. R. Co. (1876) 11 Nev. 350, 21 Am. Rep. 757, it was held that an affidavit for removal of a case to a Federal court was insufficient, although the affiant deposed that he was the second vice president of the corporation and that the president and vice president were absent and unable to make the affidavit, because he failed to show that he had authority from the corporation to make the affidavit, and therefore the fact stated in the affidavit was a mere individual belief of the officer, and did not answer the positive requirements of the statute that the affidavit must be made by a party to the suit.

In North Penn Iron Co. v. Boyce (1904) 71 N. J. L. 434, 58 Atl. 1094, it was held that an affidavit on behalf of a corporation for an attachment was insufficient, under a statute which authorized an attachment to issue, "where the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, shall make affidavit 'where the affidavit was made by the secretary of the corporation without authority being shown for making the affidavit, the statutory duty of the secretary of a corporation being 'to record all the votes of the corporation and directors, and perform such other duties as shall be assigned him,' plainly not extending to the making of an affidavit upon which litigation is to be instituted.

In Meton v. Isham Wagon Co. (1838) 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 259, 4 N. Y. Supp. 215, under a statute providing that where a party is a domestic corporation pleadings must be verified by an officer thereof, it was held that a verification made by one who swore that he was the general manager of the defendant corporation, nothing being stated in the affidavit as to the duties which devolved upon, or were performed by, the affiant, the affidavit was insufficient.

Under a statute providing that if the defendant be a corporation the affidavit may be made by the principal officer, or any agent or employee having knowledge of the necessary facts, an affidavit made by one who averred that he was special agent of the corporation, having knowledge of the necessary facts, was insufficient because it did not aver that he was an officer of the corporation, or define the scope of his agency to embrace the authority or duty to make the affidavit, or give any reason why it was not made by an officer of the corporation. Galashevsky v. Camden F. Ins. Asso. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 511.

In JONES & Co. v. HANCOCK (reported herewith) ante, it was held that an affidavit filed with a declaration in assumpsit was insufficient, where it was made by the president of the corporation, but without any averment therein of his agency or any other evidence on the subject, such affidavit not being in compliance with a statute which requires the affidavit of the plaintiff or his agent to be filed, as the fact that affiant was president did not, per se, import such agency.

In Wiley v. C. Aultman & Co. (1881) 53 Wis. 560, 11 N. W. 32, where the sufficiency of an affidavit for an attachment was questioned, under a statute providing that the affidavit shall be made by the plaintiff or someone in his behalf, it was contended that an affidavit made by a corporation which could not make an affidavit in person need not show upon its face that the person making it was either the agent, attorney, or officer of the corporation, and that it is made upon behalf of the corporation, but that if either of those facts is disputed by the person against whom the writ was issued it may be proved by evidence, as any other fact. The court held, however, that the affidavit ought to show upon its face the facts showing the affiant's knowledge, or at least that the relation of the affiant to the plaintiff was such as would authorize the court to presume that he had the knowledge that would justify him in making the affidavit, and that the affidavit was defective in failing to show that the person making it occupied the relation of agent, attorney, or officer or that he had any knowledge of the amount of the indebtedness of the defendant, and also in failing to state that it was made on behalf of the corporation.

In Mintz v. Tri-County Natural Gas Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 477, 108 Atl. 285, it was held that an affidavit of defense in behalf of a corporation was insufficient, where it was made by the superintendent of the corporation, but it was not stated that he was an officer, or why the affidavit was not made by an officer of the corporation.

In Yeier v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 258, it was held that an affidavit of defense, made by one who stated that he was the adjuster and authorized representative or agent of the defendant for the purpose of making the affidavit of defense, was insufficient, because it did not state that he was an officer of the corporation, or why the affidavit was not made by an officer.

And in Yeier v. Camden F. Ins. Asso. (1917) 66 Pa. Super. Ct. 571, an affidavit of defense was held insufficient, which described the affiant as "special agent of the above-named defendant, having knowledge of the necessary facts hereinafter set forth."

In Taylor v. Sutherlin-Meade Tobacco Co. (1908) 107 Va. 787, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1135, 60 S. E. 132, it was held that the words "secretary and treasurer," appended to the signature of an affidavit for attachment on behalf of a corporation, were insufficient to show that the affidavit was within the requirements of a statute that it must be executed by plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, as the court cannot take judicial knowledge of the fact that the secretary and treasurer of a corporation is, by virtue of his office, agent of the corporation, in contemplation of the Attachment Statute. And this view was not affected by the fact that a different statute provided that service of process may be made upon the president, treasurer, or other chief officer.

Nor was the Attachment Statute complied with by affidavits which were merely signed by individuals with the titles, "vice president," and "director," respectively appended to their names, as correct practice requires that the affidavit aver that the affiant is the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney. Dameron v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (1911) 112 Va. 544, 72 S. E. 153.

Where an account to be filed with a mechanic's lien is required to be verified by the oath of the "claimant or his agent," a verification by the president of a corporation, in which he is merely described as the president, is insufficient, as the president is not, by virtue of his office, the agent of the corporation to make such an affidavit; and unless the affidavit avers that he is in fact the agent of the corporation for that purpose the lien is not perfected. Clement v. Adams Bros.-Paynes Co. (1912) 113 Va. 547, 75 S. E. 294.

In Freehold Loan & Sav. Co. v. Bank of Commerce (1879) 44 U. C. Q. B. 284, an affidavit which was made for a corporation by one described as the manager was held to be insufficient, under a statute which directs that the affidavit shall be that of the mortgagee or of the agent of the mortgagee, if such agent is aware of all the circumstances connected therewith and is properly authorized in writing to take such mortgage, and that a copy of such authority shall be registered therewith, because no written authority to him was attached to or registered with the mortgage; the manager not standing in the same position as the president of a corporation, but being regarded as a mere agent with certain specified executive functions. The court distinguishes Bank of Toronto v. McDougall (1865) 15 U. C. C. P. 475, on the ground that in that case the affidavit was made by the president of the corporation, his act being that of the corporation and not of a mere agent. The Freehold Loan & Sav. Co. Case was followed, on similar facts, in Green & Sons Co. v. Castleman (1894) 25 Ont. Rep. 113.

But in Shawnee Commercial & Sav. Bank Co. v. Miller (1902) 24 Ohio C. C. 198, it was held, under a statute providing that the affidavit for an attachment may be made by the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, that an affidavit was sufficient when made on behalf of a corporation by one who, being sworn, said that he was a director and agent of the corporation, without stating or showing that he was authorized to make the affidavit.

And the authority of an agent to make an affidavit of defense for a corporation is sufficiently shown, by an allegation in the affidavit that he is the district agent of the company, that the defendant is a corporation of another state, in which state the executive officers reside, that he has full authority to make the affidavit, and that there is not sufficient time to have the affidavit executed by an officer of the company at the home office, and returned, that none of the executive officers reside in the state, and that he is thoroughly acquainted with the facts. Giordano v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 233.

In Citizens Natural Gas Co. v. Waynesburg Natural Gas Co. (1904) 210 Pa. 137, 59 Atl. 822, it was held that an affidavit of defense on behalf of a corporation was sufficient, where it was averred that the persons making the affidavit were the only persons having any knowledge of the facts set forth in the pleading, that the corporation had no corporate officers, as it had been merged into another corporation, and that they were the owners of all the capital stock.

In Shaft v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 544, 23 Am. Rep. 138, where the person verifying a petition on behalf of a corporation swore that he was the general manager and agent of the corporation, the court said that it went far to show that he had the authority to make the affidavit, and when in addition it appeared that the affidavit was produced and formally procured by the attorneys of record for the corporation, acting authoritatively, the sanction and authority of the corporation were impressed upon it.

Under a statutory provision whereby an affidavit for an attachment on behalf of a corporation must be verified by the chief officer or agent who may be found in the county, an affidavit of the vice president was prima facie sufficient, in the absence of an averment by the other party that he was not, at the time, the chief officer in the county. Kentucky Jeans Clothing Co. v. Bohn (1898) 104 Ky. 387, 47 S. W. 250.

In Re Close (1895) 106 Cal. 574, 39 Pac. 1067, an affidavit signed by one who swore in the affidavit that he was vice president of the corporation was sufficient, under a statute providing that when a corporation is a party, "the verification may be made by any officer thereof."

In Re St. Lawrence & A. R. Co. (1892) 133 N. Y. 270, 31 N. E. 218, it was held that verification of a petition for condemnation by the attorney for the petitioner, who stated in the verification that he "is its duly authorized attorney and agent, appointed by the plaintiff to verify petitions and pleadings in behalf of the plaintiff, for the institution of condemnation proceedings and otherwise, and is the agent of the plaintiff for the purpose of acquiring the real estate described in the foregoing petition," was sufficient to show that he was an officer of the corporation, under a Code provision that the petition on behalf of a corporation must be verified by "an officer thereof."

In Yost v. Commercial Bank (1892) 94 Cal. 494, 29 Pac. 858, it was held that, where it appeared in the body of an affidavit that the person who signed it was secretary of the corporation, it was unnecessary to add

It is held in some cases that the authority of the agent to make the affidavit may sufficiently appear outside of the affidavit. Melcher v. Scruggs (1880) 72 Mo. 406; Kearney v. Lindell R. Co. (1884) 15 Mo. App. 576; Bauer Grocery Co. v. Smith (1895) 61 Mo. App. 665; New Brunswick S. B. & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin (1834) 14 N. J. L. 440; Yellow Pine Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (1897) 21 Misc. 164, 47 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed in (1897) 22 App. Div. 629, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1135; Nason Mfg. Co. v. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. (1894) 81 Hun, 578, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1031; Erie Boot & Shoe Co. v. Eichenlaub (1889) 127 Pa. 164, 17 Atl. 889.

Thus, in Melcher v. Scruggs (Mo.) supra, it was held that an affidavit for appeal by a corporation was sufficient, though it did not show it was made by an agent of the corporation, where it was made by a person whose deposition was read in the case in which he testified that he was the business manager of the corporation.

In Bauer Grocery Co. v. Smith (1895) 61 Mo. App. 665, it does not appear whether or not plaintiff was a corporation, but it was there held that, where the reasonable inference from the record was that the person who signed an affidavit for attachment was one of the attorneys who brought the suit, there was a sufficient showing of agency.

In New Brunswick S. B. & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin (1834) 14 N. J. L. 440, it was held that an affidavit for an appeal on behalf of a corporation was sufficient if made by the president, and that it sufficiently appeared that he was president, although such fact was not sworn to but was recited by the justice at the beginning of the affidavit, and the appeal bond, which was one of the documents in the case, was signed by the same person, as president, with the seal of the corporation affixed, this being sufficient to convince the court that the affiant was president, which was all that was necessary.

In Yellow Pine Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (1897) 21 Misc. 164, 47 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed in (1897) 22 App. Div. 629, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1185, it was held that a defect in an affidavit for attachment, in which the person deposing was merely described as vice president of the corporation, without a direct averment that he was such officer, was remedied by a correct verification to the complaint.

In Nason Mfg. Co. v. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. (1894) 81 Hun, 578, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1031, it was held that a defect in an affidavit, in that it failed to fully show that the matters were true of the affiant's own knowledge, was remedied by a proper averment in the verification to the complaint which accompanied the affidavit, and was referred to in it.

In Erle Boot & Shoe Co. v. Eichenlaub (Pa.) supra, a defective averment as to the authority of the affiant making an affidavit on behalf of a corporation was held to have been cured, by a proper averment in a supplementary affidavit.

See also Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v. Stever (1899) 29 Misc. 571, 62 N. Y. Supp. 249, in which the court looks to a statement in the complaint as supplying an omission in the affidavit of verification and White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Betting (1893) 53 Mo. App. 260, in which the court said, obiter, that the showing of authority is sufficient, if it appears from the affidavit or any part of the record.

However, in Cope v. Minnesota Type Foundry Co. (1897) 20 Mont. 67, 49 Pac. 387, it was held that the body of a chattel mortgage could not be looked to for the facts to support the affidavit thereto, by showing that the corporation was domiciled in another state, so as to justify the making of the affidavit by an agent.

V. Showing that affiant is the officer or agent he purports to be.

Aside from the question of the authority of a particular officer to act for a corporation in making an affidavit, the sufficiency of the showing that the affiant is in fact the officer he purports to be is raised in some of the cases, which hold that the official capacity of the affiant should be shown by his oath, and not merely by recital of the fact in the unsworn parts of the affidavit, or by a descriptive title attached to his signature. Blake Crusher Co. v. Ward (1874) Fed. Cas. No. 1,505; Steinbach v. Leese (1865) 27 Cal. 295; Wilmington Sash & Door Co. v. Taylor (1911) 2 Boyce (Del.) 528, 82 Atl. 86; St. Joseph's Polish Catholic Beneficial Soc. v. St. Hedwig's Church (1901) 3 Penn. (Del.) 229, 50 Atl. 535; Blades Lumber Co. v. Kent & W. Lumber Co. (1899) 2 Marv. (Del.) 302, 43 Atl. 174; State v. Washoe County (1869) 5 Nev. 317.

Thus, in Blake Crusher Co. v. Ward (Fed.) supra, the court, in holding that the verification by an agent of a corporation of a bill for a preliminary injunction was insufficient, said: "When the bill is signed by an agent or officer of a corporation complainant, or by an agent or solicitor of the complainant, it should appear that the person made oath that he was such agent, officer, or solicitor."

And in Steinbach v. Leese (1865) 27 Cal. 295, a description of deponent in an affidavit of publication, as "principal clerk in the office of the California Chronicle," before the words, "deposes and says," was held insufficient, in that he did not swear that that was his position.

And in Remington Sewing Mach. Co. v. Cushen (1880) 8 Mo. App. 529, and Jeary v. American Exch. Bank (1902) 2 Neb. (Unof.) 657, 89 N. W. 771, it is said to be the better practice to swear to the fact of agency.

However, in Old Settlers Invest. Co. v. White (1910) 158 Cal. 236, 110 Pac. 922; Fremont Cultivator Co. v. Fulton (1885) 103 Ind. 393, 3 N. E. 135; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Betting (1893) 53 Mo. App. 260, and New Brunswick S. B. & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin (1834) 14 N. J. L. 440, where the question was directly raised and decided, it was held to be sufficient if the affidavit merely recited that the affiant was an officer of the corporation, without such statement appearing in the sworn part of the affidavit.

And in other cases, in which the statement that the affiant was an officer of the corporation appeared in the affidavit merely as recital, and not under oath, the showing of authority was held to be sufficient, although the court did not discuss the question as to whether the statement that affiant was an officer should appear in the sworn part of the affidavit. International Seal Co. v. Beyer (1909) 33 App. D. C. 172; Birmingham Realty Co. v. Barron (1907) 150 Ala. 232, 43 So. 346; Casavant & C. Co. v. Smith (1906) 115 Me. 168, 98 Atl. 577; Forbes Lithograph Mfg. Co. v. Winter (1895) 107 Mich. 116, 64 N. W. 1053; Moline, M. & S. Co. v. Curtis (1893) 38 Neb. 520, 57 N. W. 161.

It is generally held that when an officer of a corporation makes an affidavit in its behalf, it is not necessary that he should state the sources of his knowledge, or information and belief. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Dickerson (1914) 15 Ga. App. 293, 82 S. E. 942; National Park Bank v. Whitmore (1886) 40 Hun (N. Y.) 499; American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Voisin (1887) 44 Hun (N. Y.) 85; Essex County Nat. Bank v. Johnson (1891) 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 321, 16 N. Y. Supp. 71; Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Hall (1891) 60 Hun, 466, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 131, 15 N. Y. Supp. 208, affirmed without opinion in (1892) 129 N. Y. 663, 30 N. E. 65; Duryea, W. & Co. v. Rayner (1895) 11 Misc. 294, 32 N. Y. Supp. 247; Henry v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1904) 43 Misc. 589, 89 N. Y. Supp. 525, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 97 App. Div. 631, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1106; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchison (1882) 87 N. C. 22; Andrews v. Blue Ridge Packing Co. (1903) 206 Pa. 370, 55 Atl. 1059.

Thus, in Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Dickerson (1914) 15 Ga. App. 293, 82 S. E. 942, it is held that, where a corporation is summoned as a garnishee, the answer must be made either by one of its servants or agents who has actual, personal knowledge of the state of its dealings with the defendant, or by an officer of the corporation to whom such knowledge will be imputed by law.

So where, in an affidavit for an attachment, a positive statement is made by an officer of the corporation making the affidavit, that the corporation is entitled to recover the sum mentioned, it is not necessary for him to show when and from whom the information was derived. National Park Bank v. Whitmore (1886) 40 Hun (N. Y.) 499.

In American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Voisin (1887) 44 Hun (N. Y.) 85, which involved the sufficiency of an affidavit for an attachment made by the cashier of a bank, it was held that, being the fiscal officer of the corporation within the line of whose duty its loans and overdrafts would in the usual course of business be made, he may be presumed from the tenor of the affidavit to have had actual knowledge of the facts, which he stated in positive terms. The court distinguished Marine Nat. Bank v. Ward (N. Y.) infra, on the ground that in that case the affidavit was not made by any person either appearing to have, or who, it could be presumed, had, knowledge of the existence of the indebtedness or of the facts out of which it might have arisen.

In Essex County Nat. Bank v. Johnson (1891) 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 321, 16 N. Y. Supp. 71, it was held that the position of the president of a bank was such that he would be presumed to have knowledge in reference to claims which might exist against the corporation, which he represented at the time of the commencement of an attachment, so that his affidavit, stating that there are no counterclaims to the cause of action known either to the plaintiff or deponent, was sufficient, without a statement that the affidavit was made on affiant's personal knowledge.

The affidavit of the president of a corporation, wherein he swears positively to the sale and delivery of goods by the corporation to defendant, imports personal knowledge, and is sufficient, prima facie, to warrant an attachment. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Hall (1891) 60 Hun, 466, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 131, 15 N. Y. Supp. 208, affirmed without opinion in (1892) 129 N. Y. 663, 30 N. E. 65.

In Duryea, W. & Co. v. Rayner (1895) 11 Misc. 294, 32 N. Y. Supp. 247, it was held that an objection that the verification of a complaint was defective, because made by the president of the plaintiff corporation without a statement of the sources of his knowledge regarding the matters in suit, was without force, where the verification was in the usual form required in the case of a verification made by a party.

In Henry v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1904) 43 Misc. 589, 89 N. Y. Supp. 525, affirmed without opinion in (1904) 97 App. Div. 631, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1106, it was held that, under the Code provision, an officer of a domestic corporation is to be considered a party for the purposes of verification, and therefore it is not necessary that such officer should give the source of his information, any more than an individual party or member of a partnership.

In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchinson (1882) 87 N. C. 22, it was held, under a Code provision requiring that agents and attorneys, when swearing to pleadings for their principals or clients, should disclose their knowledge and its sources, that an officer of a corporation who verified a complaint was not required to disclose his knowledge and its sources, the court saying: "It can act only through its officers and other agents, and it is only by a fiction, because of their actual knowledge, that it can be said to know anything. When such an officer swears that he has knowledge of the facts set forth in the complaint, and that they are truly stated therein, he has done all, it would seem, that can be done, and certainly all that need to be done."

And in Andrews v. Blue Ridge Packing Co. (1903) 206 Pa. 370, 55 Atl. 1059, where an affidavit of defense was made by the business manager of a corporation, it was held that, as such officer, he must be presumed to be acquainted with the facts, and as he took the responsibility of swearing positively, as of his own knowledge, it was unnecessary for him to set forth his information and belief.

But where an officer makes the statements contained in his affidavit simply upon information and belief, he should show when and from whom his information is derived, and why the affidavits of the informant are not produced. Marine Nat. Bank v. Ward (1885) 35 Hun (N. Y.) 898.

And in Geneva Non-Magnetic Watch Co. v. Payne (1888) 5 N. Y. Supp. 68, it was held that an affidavit for an attachment, made on behalf of a corporation by the secretary, was defective, because it in no way appeared that the secretary of the company possessed any knowledge of the accounts between plaintiff and defendants, which enabled him to state that the amount claimed was due over and above all counterclaims known to the plaintiff, the court basing its decision upon earlier cases, in which an affidavit was made by an agent for an individual.

While in Marshall Field Co. v. Oren Ruffcorn Co. (1902) 117 Iowa, 159, 90 N. W. 618, where an answer on behalf of a corporation, denying its signature to certain notes, was verified by the secretary of the company, the court said that, while it is probable the officer should show knowledge of the facts in order to enable him to deny the signature, where the answer was said, in the abstract before the court, to have been duly verified by the secretary, without setting out the verification, it would be presumed to have been sufficient in that respect.

b. Agents or attorneys.

Where an affidavit is made on behalf of a corporation by one who is merely its agent or attorney, his personal knowledge of the matters sworn to will not be presumed, and therefore the means and sources of his information should be shown. Columbia Screw Co. v. Warner Lock Co. (1903) 138 Cal. 445, 71 Pac. 498; Kokomo Straw-Board Co. v. Inman (1889) 53 Hun, 39, 5 N. Y. Supp. 888; Weehawken

Wharf Co. v. Knickerbocker Coal Co. (1898) 24 Misc. 683, 53 N. Y. Supp. 982; Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427; American Trading Co. v. Bedouin Steam Nav. Co. (1905) 48 Misc. 624, 96 N. Y. Supp. 271; Mintz v. Tri-County Natural Gas Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 477, 103 Atl. 285; WAKELY v. SUN INS. OFFICE (reported herewith) ante, 128; Galashevsky v. Camden F. Ins. Asso. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 511; Quesenberry v. People's Bldg. L. & Sav. Asso. (1898) 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. 73. See also Banks v. Gay Mfg. Co. (1891) 108 N. C. 282, 12 S. E. 741, and Erie Boot & Shoe Co. v. Eichenlaub (1889) 127 Pa. 164, 17 Atl. 889, supra.

Thus, where an affidavit on behalf of a corporation, to procure an order for publication of summons, was made by the attorney for the corporation, who, after reciting the fact of the debt, stated that "the matters and things hereinbefore alleged concerning the indebtedness of said defendant to plaintiff are stated upon information received from the said plaintiff," was insufficient, as it did not state that the facts were within the knowledge of affiant, but on the contrary showed that they were not within his knowledge, and even then there was no statement that he believed the matters and things to be true. Columbia Screw Co. v. Warner Lock Co. (1903) 138 Cal. 445, 71 Pac. 498.

In Weehawken Wharf Co. v. Knickerbocker Coal Co. (1898) 24 Misc. 683, 53 N. Y. Supp. 982, it was held that an affidavit for an attachment, made on behalf of a corporation by its attorney, was insufficient, because it did not show that affiant had any personal knowledge as to the matter of counterclaim, nor, if the allegations were deemed to be made upon information and belief, was the information or source thereof disclosed.

In Quesenberry v. People's Bldg. L. & Sav. Asso. (1898) 44 W. Va. 512, 30 S. E. 73, it was held that an affidavit of defense, which was made by the attorney for a corporation, was not sufficient, because the affidavit called for personal knowledge of the accounts between the parties, and he did not show that he was personally cognizant of the facts; but, on the contrary, the affidavit clearly showed that it was not made upon his personal knowledge.

Under a Code provision that the verification of a pleading must be made by a party, except that where the party is a domestic corporation it must be made by an officer, and where it is a foreign corporation it may be made by the agent of, or the attorney for, the party, an officer of a foreign corporation is an agent thereof, in law, and within the meaning of the Code, and the secretary of such a corporation may verify a pleading; but to do so, he must comply with another section of the Code, which provides that an agent must set forth in the affidavit the grounds of his belief as to all matters not stated upon his knowledge. Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427.

In American Trading Co. v. Bedouin Steam Nav. Co. (1905) 48 Misc. 624, 96 N. Y. Supp. 271, it was held that in order to obtain a warrant of attachment on the ground that defendant is a foreign corporation, it is necessary for plaintiff to show, not merely to allege, that defendant is a foreign corporation, and that such fact may be said to be shown if it is positively alleged by some person who may be deemed to have personal knowledge upon the subject, so that his statement can be accepted as evidence of the fact; but that where the affidavit was made in behalf of the plaintiff corporation, by one who swore that he was in its employ as manager for its hemp department, such statement would lend no color to the statement that he had personal knowledge of the fact and place of incorporation of the defendant, and in the absence of submission of evidence which would prove to the court, at least prima facie, that defendant was a foreign corporation, the court would regard affiant's statement, that he had personal knowledge of that fact, as so improbable that it would conclude he made the statement inadvertently, and without precise appreciation of its effect.

In Mintz v. Tri-County Natural Gas Co. (1918) 259 Pa. 477, 103 Atl. 285, it was held that an affidavit, made by the chief accountant of the corporation, in which he neither claimed to be an officer who would naturally possess a knowledge of the facts averred in the affidavit, nor attempted to state the sources of his information, was insufficient.

In Galashevsky v. Camden F. Ins. Asso. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 511, the court held that an affidavit of defense, made by one who styled himself as special agent of the defendant corporation, was defective, because, among other things, while he averred material facts, he did not disclose his knowledge or opportunity for knowledge of the matters set forth.

But in Globe Yarn Mills v. Bilbrough (1892) 2 Misc. 100, 21 N. Y. Supp. 2, affirming (1892) 22 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 186, 19 N. Y. Supp. 176, it was held that where the person who made the affidavit for attachment on behalf of a corporation was the one who acted for the treasurer of the corporation, and conducted the negotiations and completed the transactions with the defendant, he stood, not in the position of an attorney, but of a principal, and his affidavit as to counterclaims and offsets, being positive and absolute, and not upon information and belief, and stating that he got the instrument sued upon from the corporation's treasurer to whose order they were payable, was sufficient, as against an objection that there was no showing by competent and adequate evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum stated, over and above all counterclaims.

In New York, the question has been raised as to whether an officer who makes an affidavit on behalf of a corporation should show that he was such officer at the time the transaction arose.

806, it was held that where a complaint was verified by one who swore that he was secretary and treasurer of the plaintiff corporation, that he had read the complaint and knew the contents thereof, and that the same was in all respects true, of his own knowledge, except as to the matters stated to be upon information and belief, and that all the material allegations of the complaint were true, of his personal knowledge, was sufficient, without pleading that he was secretary and treasurer of the corporation at the time the transaction arose.

In Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Hall (1891) 60 Hun, 466, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 131, 15 N. Y. Supp. 208, affirmed without opinion in (1892) 129 N. Y. 663, 30 N. E. 65, while there was a difference of opinion among the judges as to whether an affidavit positively sworn to by the president of a corporation, reciting the sale and delivery of goods to a defendant, was prima facie sufficient to warrant the granting of an attachment, or whether it should be shown further that he was connected with the active business and with the books or accounts of the corporation in such a way as to justify an inference of knowledge of its pecuniary affairs, or whether he should state that he had any knowledge of the financial affairs of the corporation, the judges were agreed that an affidavit was insufficient, where it was made by the president of the corporation, without stating that he held such position at the time the goods were sold.

In Barstow Stove Co. v. Darling (1894) 81 Hun, 564, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1033, an affidavit made by the manager and agent of the plaintiff corporation was held sufficient, over an objection that it failed to show that he was such manager and agent at the time of the transaction involved, where the affidavit contained a positive assertion of personal knowledge on the part of the affiant.

And in Nason Mfg. Co. v. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. (1894) 81 Hun, 578, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1081, it was held that an affidavit was sufficient as against a similar objection, where the affiant verified a complaint which accompanied the affidavit, and was referred to in it, and therein asserted that the matter was true of his own knowledge.

In Central Nat. Bank v. Ft. Ann Woolen Co. (1893) 57 N. Y. S. R. 316, 24 N. Y. Supp. 640, affirmed without opinion in (1894) 76 Hun, 610, 27 N. Y. Supp. 1114, which is affirmed in (1894) 143 N. Y. 624, 37 N. E. 827, the court holds that the affidavit of the president of plaintiff's corporation was sufficient, although it did not recite that he was president at the time the transaction arose, where, from a careful examination of the affidavit, the court is satisfied that it sufficiently indicated that the affiant was president at the time of the transaction, and is familiar with the financial affairs of the corporation, this fact distinguishing the case from Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Hall (1891) 60 Hun, 466, 15 N. Y. Supp. 208.

In Yellow Pine Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (1897) 21 Misc. 164, 47 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed in (1897) 22 App. Div. 629, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1135, the court held that an objection to an affidavit for an attachment, made by the vice president of the plaintiff, on the ground that the affiant did not disclose his means of knowledge of the facts, and the nonexistence of counterclaims, and did not state that he was vice president of the company at the time of the occurrence of the event out of which the cause of action arose, was not valid, where the affiant stated that he derived his knowledge and information from the provisions of the written instrument upon which the action was brought, and from an examination of the books of the corporation, and from conversation with the employees, even if it might be inferred or presumed that he was not such officer at the time the transaction arose; for it appeared from the facts which he did state that he proceeded to obtain the information evidenced by the books and the reports of the employees, before he made the affidavit for attachment.

Where one, who was secretary of a corporation at the time the account in question accrued, made affidavit that the amount stated was due to the corporation, over and above all counterclaims existing in favor of the defendant, and a similar statement was made by the present secretary, the affidavits were held to be sufficient, under a statute which provides that, in an attachment proceeding to recover damages for a breach of contract, the affidavit must show that the plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum stated therein, over and above all counterclaims known to him, the affidavit having been objected to on the ground that it did not appear that, at the present time, the former secretary was an officer of the corporation, and he could not know whether any counterclaim had arisen since he ceased to be an officer, and that the present secretary had no personal knowledge of the contract set forth in the complaint. E. W. Bliss Co. v. Opera Glass Supply Co. (1891) 60 Hun, 438, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 136, 15 N. Y. Supp. 6.

VIII. Necessity of showing why the affidavit was not made by the party, or an officer of the corporation.

Where an affidavit on behalf of a corporation is made by an officer thereof, it is not necessary that the affidavit set forth the reasons why it is not made by the party, under statutes providing, generally, that when an affidavit is made by an agent or attorney, the affiant should state why it is not made by the party. Scott Stamp & Coin Co. v. Leake (1908) 9 Cal. App. 511, 99 Pac. 731; Hornick v. Union P. R. Co. (1911) 85 Kan. 568, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 826, 118 Pac. 60, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 208; Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchison (1882) 87 N. C. 22.

Thus, in Scott Stamp & Coin Co. v. Leake (Cal.) supra, it was held that an affidavit made by the treasurer of a corporation need not set forth the reason why it was not made by the party, under a statute providing that, when an affidavit to a claim against an estate is made by a person other than the claimant, the reason therefor must be set forth, as the affidavit in such case is not made by a third person, but by the corporation itself, through one of its authorized officers, which is the only way a corporation can act.

In Hornick v. Union P. R. Co. (1911) 85 Kan. 568, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 826, 118 Pac. 60, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 208, it is held, under a statute providing that "when a municipal or other corporation is a party, the verification may be made by an officer thereof, his agent, or attorney," that a pleading may be verified by an attorney for a corporation, without setting forth why the verification was not made by the corporation itself, another statutory provision that when the verification is made by an agent or attorney, he shall state the reason why it is not made by the party himself, being held to apply to natural persons only.

Where the secretary of a foreign corporation, as its agent, verifies a pleading, under a Code provision that where a foreign corporation is a party the verification may be made by the agent of, or attorney for, the party, he need not set forth the reason why it is not made by the party, for that would be senseless in the case of a corporation, which cannot take an oath. Robinson v. Ecuador Development Co. (1900) 32 Misc. 106, 65 N. Y. Supp. 427.

In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hutchison (N. C.) supra, it was held that the president of a corporation who verified a complaint on its behalf was not required to state why the corporation had not made the verification, under a statute providing that agents and attorneys who verify a pleading should state the reasons why it was not made by the party, the court saying: "A corporation can take no oath, and can therefore make no verification; and it would be idle for its officer to explain why it has not done so."

But when, under such a statute, an affidavit is made on behalf of a corporation by an agent or attorney, as distinguished from an officer, the affidavit should show why it was not made by an officer of the corporation. Columbia Screw Co. v. Warner Lock Co. (1903) 138 Cal. 445, 71 Pac. 498; Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr (1898)

Under a statute providing that when a pleading is verified by the attorney or any other person, except one of the parties, he must set forth in the affidavit the reasons why it is not made by one of the parties, an affidavit on behalf of the corporation, made by its attorney, was defective in failing to state why it was not made by plaintiff, or some officer thereof. Columbia Screw Co. v. Warner Lock Co. (Cal.) supra.

Under a statute providing: "The affidavit of an agent or attorney must state the absence from the county of the party or parties for whom it is made, and the fact that the affiant is agent or attorney," an affidavit made for a corporation by an attorney must show that he was authorized to make it, by a statement that the officer or agent, who would be required to verify it if in the county, was absent therefrom. Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr (1898) 102 Ky. 586, 44 S. W. 216.

Under a statute providing that an affidavit required to be attached to a chattel mortgage may, in case any party is absent, be made by the agent or attorney of such party, the absence of a party must be clearly set forth in the affidavit itself before an agent can make the oath required; and where a corporation is a party to a chattel mortgage, the absence of the corporation must be set forth, it being insufficient if it merely appears that the corporation is organized under the laws of another state. Cope v. Minnesota Type Foundry Co. (1897) 20 Mont. 67, 49 Pac. 387.

In Banks v. Gay Mfg. Co. (1891) 108 N. C. 282, 12 S. E. 741, it was held that, under a Code provision that "when a corporation is a party the verification may be made by any officer thereof," the verification could not be made by a mere agent, and the court said, further: "Besides, if the answer of a corporation could be verified by an agent, the affidavit is not sufficient, in that it does not set forth his knowledge or the grounds of his belief on the subject, and the reason why it was not made by the party. When the verification is by an officer of the company, this is not required, for the officer speaks for and is the mouthpiece of the corporation."

The decision in the reported case (WAKELY v. SUN INS. OFFICE, ante, 128) is followed in Galashevsky v. Camden F. Ins. Asso. (1916) 63 Pa. Super. Ct. 511, in which it was held that an affidavit of defense, made by one who styled himself as the special agent of the defendant, was insufficient because, among other defects, he did not give any reason why it was not made by an officer of the corporation.

In Erie Boot & Shoe Co. v. Eichenlaub (1889) 127 Pa. 164, 17 Atl. 889, it was held that an objection against an affidavit of defense by a corporation, that it was made by a mere stockholder, without setting out any special knowledge of the facts or any reason why it was not made by an officer or director, was well taken, but its effect was obviated by an averment in a supplementary affidavit that the affiant was the manager of the business of the company.

In Clark's Cove Fertilizer Co. v. Stever (1899) 29 Misc. 571, 62 N. Y. Supp. 249, under a Code provision for the verification of pleadings, which provided that where the party is a foreign corporation, the verification may be made by the agent of, or the attorney for, the party, it was held that a recital in a verification that "the reason why this verification is not made by the plaintiff is because he does not reside in the county of Columbia, and is a corporation," while inartificially drawn, was, in effect, a declaration that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and was sufficient, especially as the complaint contained the statement that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation.

Officers — liability for acts of subordinates.

1. Public officers are not liable for the negligence of their subordinates unless they co-operate in the act complained of, or direct or encourage it.

Municipal corporation — speed ordinances — exemption of firemen.

2. Officers and men of a fire department are exempt from the ordinary limitations established by ordinance with respect to speed only so far as such exemption is expressly provided.

Master and servant — liability of superintendent of fire department — respondeat superior.

3. The superintendent of a fire department is not liable, on the theory of respondeat superior, for the negligence of a fireman driving his automobile under his assignment of duty, upon recommendation of the fire chief.

— acquiescence in negligent act.

4. Ratification of a negligent act of a servant may be equivalent to command by the master, and co-operation of the master may be inferred from

Negligence — driver of automobile — liability of passenger.

5. A superintendent of a fire department who permits his car to be driven at excessive speed by a fireman assigned to duty as his driver, after reasonable opportunity to protest, may be found to have approved of the unlawful speed so as to be liable for injuries thereby inflicted upon a traveler on the highway.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in 1913 was the fire commissioner of the city of New York. On March 20 of that year he left fire headquarters in one of the department's automobiles, to inspect some new fire houses in Brooklyn. The automobile was driven by a fireman assigned to that duty by the commissioner, upon the recommendation of the fire chief. While so driven, it collided with another automobile, and the plaintiff was injured. The complaint charges that at the time of the collision the automobile carrying the defendant was driven under his orders, and that it was driven negligently and at excessive speed. The officers and men of the fire department are not exempt from the ordinary limitations in respect of speed, unless they are "proceeding to a fire" (Charter of New York [Laws 1901, chap. 466], § 748), or "responding for emergency work in case of fire, accident, public disaster, or impending danger" (Code of Ordinances of N. Y. chap. 24, art. 2, § 17, subd. 6).

The plaintiff's counsel, in opening the case, stated that the defendant's car was going at the rate of 50 miles an hour. He was about to offer evidence of the negligence charged, when he was checked by a ruling of the court that, no matter what the action or negligence of the chauffeur might be, the defendant was not liable. The record is very informal, and the plaintiff's offer of proof is not as definite as we might wish; but we think there is no doubt in respect of the ruling which the court intended to make. The court's view was that, because the relation between the defendant and the driver was not that of master and servant, no speed, however excessive, could tend to fasten upon the defendant a liability for the wrong. The complaint was dismissed, and on appeal to the appellate division the judgment was affirmed by a divided court.

We think there was error in refusing to give the plaintiff an opportunity to unfold his case. We see no repugnancy between the complaint and the opening. None certainly can be found in the mere relation that subsisted between the defendant and the driver. We do not doubt the rule invoked by counsel for the defendant, and sustained by superabundant citations, that public officers are not liable for the negligence of their subordinates unless they co-operate in the act complained of, or direct or encourage it. Lane v. Cotton, 1 Ld. Raym. 646, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1332; Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 531, 538, 38 Am. Dec. 669; Cardot v. Barney, 63 N. Y. 281, 20 Am. Rep. 533; Robertson v. Sichel, 127 U. S. 507, 32 L. ed. 203, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1286; Ely v. Parsons, 55 Conn. 83, 10 Atl. 499; Story, Agency, § 319. That is, at least, the general rule, and if it is subject to any other qualifications they are not now material.

But here the very question is whether the defendant did direct or encourage the negligent act, or personally co-operate in it. Undoubtedly he is not liable for the negligence of the driver on the theory of respondeat superior. The relation between them was not that of master and servant. If he had been out of the car at the time of the accident, no one would suggest that he must answer for the driver's wrong. Even his presence in the car would be insufficient of itself, and in all circumstances, to charge him with liability. There must have been command or co-operation. De Carvalho v. Brunner, 223 N. Y. 284, 287, 119 N. E. 563; 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. pp. 213, 244. But ratification may be equivalent to command, and co-operation may be inferred from acquiescence, where there is power to restrain. The charge is that this car was going at the rate of 50 miles an hour. The charge is that it was going under the defendant's orders. If the defendant permitted such a speed to be maintained, and this after reasonable opportunity for protest, a jury might find his silence the equivalent of approval. Many circumstances would have to be weighed. Chief among them, perhaps, would be the duration of the offense and the opportunity to restrain it. There was the right to restrain here, for the driver was subject to the defendant's orders (Charter N. Y. City, § 728); but the right is of no importance, unless the omission to exercise it was unreasonable. We cannot say whether the inference of such an omission is legitimate till the whole story has been told. We must see the whole picture. For the purpose of this appeal, it is enough that the defendant is not exonerated as of course, because the man at the helm was not his servant. One cannot let oneself be driven at breakneck speed through city streets, and charge the whole guilt upon the driver, who has done one's tacit bidding.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

ANNOTATION.

Responsibility of public officer for negligence of subordinate in operation of vehicle.

A careful search discloses no decision except the reported case (DOWLER v. JOHNSON, ante, 146), wherein is discussed the responsibility of a public officer for the negligence of a subordinate in the operation of a vehicle.

It will be observed that the defendant in that case was sued individually, and not in his official capacity, and Officers—liability for acts of subordinates.

Negligence—driver of automobile—liability of passenger.

Master and servant—liability of superior—tendent of fire department—respondent superior.

the court holds that if he was personally negligent in allowing his chauffeur, who was under his control, to drive the car at a high rate of speed through the streets of a city he would be liable for that negligence; and that his acquiescence in such a rate of speed, as constituting negligence, was a question which should have been submitted to the jury.

It may be laid down, however, as a general rule, that, in the language of the reported case (DOWLER v. JOHNSON), "public officers are not liable for the negligence of their subordinates unless they co-operate in the act complained of, or direct or encourage it," since the relation of master and servant does not exist, and the rule of respondeat superior does not apply. Judge Story in his work on Agency, 9th ed. § 319, states the rule as follows: "It is plain that the government itself is not responsible for the misfeasance, or wrongs, or negligences, or omissions of duty of the subordinate officers or agents employed in the public service; for it does not undertake to guarantee to any persons the fidelity of any of the officers or agents whom it employs; since that would involve it, in all its operations, in endless embarrassments, and difficulties, and losses, which would be subversive of the public interests; and, indeed, laches are never imputable to the government. Our next inquiry, therefore, is whether the heads of its departments, or other superior functionaries, are in a different predicament. And here the doctrine is now firmly established (subject to the qualifications hereinafter stated) that public officers and agents are not responsible for the misfeasances or positive wrongs, or for the nonfeasances or negligences, or omissions of duty of the subagents, or servants, or other persons properly employed by and under them, in the discharge of their official duties."

Limitation of actions — seduction — when runs.

1. The Statute of Limitations does not begin to run against a cause of action for seduction, in case of a series of illicit acts under promise of marriage, until the last illegal act under the promise.

Pleading — time of contract.

2. The time of the contract must be pleaded in an action to recover damages for breach of marriage contract.

3. The time of a marriage contract need not be laid under a videlicet in order to prove another time in an action for breach of promise to marry.

8. A finding by the trial judge on conflicting evidence offered upon motion for new trial is binding on appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thompson, Williams, & Thompson and J. H. Daly for plaintiff.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought for breach of promise and seduction. There was a judgment below in favor of plaintiff for $5,000 for the breach of promise of marriage, and $11,000 for seduction. The court of civil appeals affirmed so much of the judgment as related to the breach of promise, but directed a remittitur of $8,000 on that portion of the judgment relating to seduction, and entered a total judgment of $8,000.

Both sides have filed petitions for certiorari, the plaintiff in error insisting that there should have been no recovery against him at all, and the defendant in error complaining of the remittitur suggested by the court of civil appeals, which she accepted under protest. The case has been argued in this court.

We have discussed the facts of this case orally, and do not find it necessary to embody them in this opinion, and shall only consider herein the questions of law raised by the parties.

It is conceded by the plaintiff in error that there was some evidence below of a marriage contract between the parties, and of a breach of that contract, and that there was some evidence below of seduction, but it is maintained that these matters were not proved as alleged in the declaration, or, in other words, that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury as the case was laid.

The first count of the declaration alleges a contract entered into between the parties whereby they mutually agreed to marry each other, and that this contract was entered into October 1, 1915. The plaintiff below averred that she had continued unmarried and ready and willing to marry the defendant below, and on divers days had requested that the compact be fulfilled, but that the defendant below refused, and still refuses, to carry out said contract.

Proof introduced tended to show that the contract of marriage was entered into between the parties in September, 1912, instead of in October, 1915, as averred in the declaration, and it is urged that there is a fatal variance between the pleading and the proof.

This argument is not well taken. The alleged variance relates only to the matter of time.

While it is true that, in personal actions, the rule of the common law is that the time must be stated, nevertheless, as said by Mr. Stephen: "The time is considered in general as forming no material part of the issue, so that one time may be alleged and another proved. The pleader therefore assigns any time that he pleases to a given fact." Stephen, Pl. *292.

Mr. Stephen goes on to say that the time should be alleged under a videlicet unless the pleader wishes to be held to prove such time strictly.

videlicet.

We suppose, however, that in modern pleading a videlicet is not strictly required. This is only a matter of form.

The modern rule is thus stated by Mr. Shipman: "In all matters, generally speaking, save those previously mentioned, time is considered as forming no material part of the issue, so that the pleader, when required to allege a time for any traversable fact, is not compelled to allege it truly, and may state a fact as occurring at one time and prove it as happening at a different time. The reason of the rule is that as a day is not an independent fact or substantive matter, but a mere circumstance or accompaniment of such matter, it obviously cannot in its own nature be material, and can only be made so, if at all, by the nature of the fact or matter in connection with which it is pleaded. Therefore, if a tort is stated to have been committed, or a parol contract made, on a particular day, the plaintiff is in neither case confined in his proof to the day as laid, but may support the allegation by proof of a different day, except that the day as laid in the declaration and as proved must both be prior to the commencement of the suit." Shipman, Common-Law Pl. p. 391.

That a parol contract may be laid as of one day and proved as of another has been the rule since Shandois v. Simson, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 880, 78 Eng. Reprint, 1104.

"Time is usually immaterial and need not be proved as laid, but when material as a matter of description, strict proof is necessary." 31 Cyc. 706.

It is not suggested that there was more than one contract of marriage between the parties to this case, so that the time or date of this contract is not material as a matter of description nor for any other reason.

So, under the authorities above cited, we must hold that the variance between the time averred and the time proved is immaterial.

To the same effect is May v. Illinois C. R. Co. 129 Tenn. 521, L.R.A. 1915A, 78, 167 S. W. 477, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 213.

In addition, this court has held that an omission to lay any time in a declaration is cured by the verdict (Nashville L. Ins. Co. v. Mathews, 8 Lea, 499); and the general rule also is that a misstatement of time in a declaration is cured by the verdict (31 Cyc. 776).

The quotation made by plaintiff in error from 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 186, to the effect that the time and place of the promised marriage need not necessarily be averred, but, when pleaded, the proof must conform to the time and place alleged, relates to the time and place of the execution of the contract, and not to the time and place when the contract of marriage was entered into. Other authorities cited in the brief of plaintiff in error do not require comment. Most of them are not in point, and, if any do conflict with the above views, we are not willing to follow them.

The next proposition advanced in behalf of plaintiff in error is quite similar. Seduction was alleged to have occurred on October 1, 1915, whereas the proof tended to show that it occurred in September, 1912, and it is urged that there is no evidence to prove the case laid in the declaration. We think the authorities just cited are conclusive of this contention.

The plaintiff in error then relies on the Statute of Limitations, which was pleaded by him. The proof shows that the seduction occurred in September, 1912, and this suit was not brought until September 21, 1916, and it is insisted that the suit is accordingly barred by the twelve-month Statute of Limitations.

As heretofore stated, the first count of the declaration alleges a contract of marriage entered into October 1, 1915, and continuing up until January 1, 1916. The second count of the declaration alleges a seduction on the date mentioned, and that on divers other days and times between that date and the commencement of this suit the improper relation was renewed.

The proof of the plaintiff below tended to show a contract of marriage entered into the day after the first illicit act, and improper relations existing between her and the defendant below from this time up until within twelve months of suit. During all the time this unlawful relation continued, the parties were under a contract of marriage.

Such being the case, under the rule laid down in Davis v. Young, 90 Tenn. 303, 16 S. W. 473, the Statute of Limitations would not begin to run against such a plaintiff until the last illegal act had under the promise of marriage.

The declaration in this case is inartificial, but it was not challenged and, considered as a whole, it does aver a seduction and a continuous unlawful relation under a contemporaneous contract of marriage. It does not make any difference that the contract of marriage was not entered into prior to the first unlawful act. If it existed thereafter concurrently with the il-

~~—act before marriage~~ such contract of ~~promise—effect.~~ marriage was sufficient to prevent the defendant below from referring the Statute of Limitations to his first unlawful act.

Davis v. Young, supra, has been expressly approved in Ferguson v. Moore, 98 Tenn. 342, 39 S. W. 341, where the trial judge charged that "seduction was a continuous act, and, if by several and continuous acts, promises, and artifices the defendant kept up his illicit intercourse" until within the statutory limit of suit, the action would not be barred. This was commended as in accord with Davis v. Young, supra, and that authority extended to suits brought by the female as well as by her father.

It is furthermore insisted that the plaintiff's testimony shows a case of rape, and not a case of seduction. It is true that some of her language may bear this construction, but when her entire testimony is considered, together with the circumstances she details, it refutes any idea of rape.

It is finally urged that it was reversible error for the trial judge to disregard the testimony offered in behalf of the defendant below on a motion for a new trial, and to refuse a new trial in view of the evidence offered on this hearing.

The principal affidavits were from two men, who made oath that they themselves had enjoyed the sexual favor of plaintiff below, prior to the time of her charge of seduction against the defendant below. Some other affidavits were offered tending to reflect on the woman.

The learned trial judge ruled that such statements of men, voluntarily made with reference to a woman's character, were not entitled to credit, and such men were not entitled to be believed.

However this may be, there was evidence offered on the motion for a new trial tending to contradict many of the statements contained in the aforesaid affidavits, and the finding of the trial judge on these controverted facts is, of course, binding upon us.

Appeal—finding on motion for new trial.

Beyond all this, however, and as a conclusive answer to the contention of plaintiff in error in this respect, it appears that upon the trial of this cause his attorney conceded and stated to the jury that defendant in error was a woman of good reputation up to the time of the institution of this suit. The case was tried on that theory, and no proof was offered on the trial tending to besmirch her character.

Such being the state of the case, it was not permissible for the defendant below to undertake to shift his ground, attack the character of the woman, and assume a position entirely inconsistent with that taken upon the trial of the case, and in this way obtain a new trial.

The defendant below was free to rely on the bad character, if any he could show, of plaintiff below, and to prove that on the trial in bar of this suit. He was not willing, however, to take the chance of damages being aggravated by his failure to establish such contention, and he will not be allowed to experiment with the court and obtain a new trial and all the benefit of such matter without assuming the risk incident to its introduction at the hearing.

This is a proper case for the application of the doctrine of judicial estoppel which we have just discussed in Stearns Coal & Lumber Co. v. Jamestown R. Co. 141 Tenn. —, 208 S. W. 334: "A new trial will not be granted . . . to enable a defendant to avail himself of a defense which was within the issues, but not presented at the trial; or to make a defense inconsistent with the one presented, or contradictory to admissions made, or points tacitly conceded." 29 Cyc. 852.

This disposes of all the assignments of the plaintiff in error.

Referring to the petition of the defendant in error with reference to the action of the court of civil appeals in suggesting a remittitur, we do not find it necessary to go into any elaborate consideration thereof.

Our revisory jurisdiction of the judgments of the court of civil appeals does not permit that we should try a case anew. We are not to go over the entire record and decide it as a new controversy. It is our duty to ascertain if there are any errors in the action of the court of civil appeals and to correct such errors.

Upon consideration of all the circumstances of this case, we are not prepared to say that the court of civil appeals erred in suggesting a remittitur of part of this verdict.

We are inclined to the opinion that the result reached by the court of civil appeals is substantially just, and are not disposed to interfere therewith.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is accordingly affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

When Statute of Limitations commences to run against civil action for seduction.

- I. In general, 155.
- II. From last act of intercourse, 156.
- III. From loss of services, 158.
- IV. From attainment of majority, 160.

I. In general.

It seems to be the general rule that the right of action for seduction, other than an action for loss of services resulting therefrom, accrues at the time the seduction takes place, in other words, at the time of the first act of intercourse between the parties, and that the Statute of Limitations commences to run from that time. Davis v. Boyett (1904) 120 Ga. 649, 66 L.R.A. 258, 102 Am. St. Rep. 118, 48 S. E. 185, 1 Ann. Cas. 386; Wilhoit v. Hancock (1869) 5 Bush (Ky.) 567; Dunlap v. Linton (1891) 144 Pa. 335, 22 Atl. 819.

Thus it was said in Davis v. Boyett (Ga.) supra: "It is well established that where the suit is for the seduction, and not for loss of services and expenses incurred in consequence of the seduction, the Statute of Limitations begins to run from the act of seduction." The decisions of the Indiana and Tennessee courts were adversely commented on in that case, the court saying: "We do not think we would feel disposed to follow the courts of Tennessee and Indiana in holding that the act of seduction may be continued after the female seduced has lost her virtue. We apprehend that it would be very difficult to apply such a principle to a criminal case in which the Statute of Limitations was pleaded to an indictment for seduction, so as to avoid the bar of the statute, upon the ground that the act of seduction had been continuously performed for a considerable length of time after the first act of sexual intercourse between the accused and his alleged victim."

In Wilhoit v. Hancock (1869) 5 Bush (Ky.) 567, an action by a father for loss of services, it was said obiter that in an action for the seduction itself the statute runs "from the act of seduction." In Dunlap v. Linton (1891) 144 Pa. 335, 22 Atl. 819, a similar action, there was dictum to the same effect.

The difficulty of arriving at any general rule was referred to in Rockwell v. Day (1918) 101 Wash. 580, 172 Pac. 754, wherein it appeared that the seduction occurred on or about April 9, 1909; that the meretricious relations then begun continued until on or about December 20, 1913, and that the action was brought on December 5, 1916. The defendant contended that the statute began to run on April 9, 1909, and that the action would be barred on April 9, 1912. The plaintiff, however, insisted that the better rule is that the statute does not begin to run, where improper relations are begun under a promise of marriage, so long as the relations are continued, or until the last act of intercourse; that all the acts of intercourse are one transaction, and that a continued promise of marriage is implied from time to time. It further appeared that the illicit relations were abandoned, and later resumed, but under no new promise of marriage. The court, in commenting on the application of the rule, said: "The general rule, as most text-writers agree, is that the statute begins to run from the time of the seduction, where the action is maintained by the woman on her own behalf. . . . But whether we call the one or the other the general or the better rule, it must be admitted that there is a very marked conflict of authority. We could base our opinion on either rule and sustain it by sound reason, for if the one rule protects the artless and confiding female, the other protects the man from the artful pretensions of women who may pretend to have been seduced in order to obtain a pecuniary compensation, or to hide a shame revealed by a subsequent pregnancy, and who may fortify their pretensions by a showing of continued illicit cohabitation as a circumstance to sustain the charge of seduction under a promise of marriage, or by arts, persuasions, or promises. . . . The facts in many of the cases seem to have called for a rule that would allow or defeat the action, according to the justice of the particular case. . . . We, therefore, at this time, hesitate to lay down any rule that would be a guide for all cases, nor is it necessary as we view the facts in this case." It was held, under the facts, that a right of action for seduction under a promise of marriage accrues at the time the promise is made, and, granting that it would continue until the illicit relations are broken off and for the statutory period of three years thereafter, the application of the rule demands that the relations be continuous, and if abandoned and returned to under no new promise, the statute begins to run from the time of the voluntary resumption of the illicit relations. The court said: "An action for tort accrues at the time the wrong is committed. This rule is universal unless modified by statute, as, for instance, the statute allowing an action to be brought within three years after a fraud is discovered, or where the courts have arbitrarily worked an exception, as has been done by some of them in seduction cases. As a premise we can agree that plaintiff had a right of action on the 9th day of April, 1909, if at all, and we may grant that it would continue until the relations were broken off, and for three years thereafter. But the application of this rule demands that such intercourse be continuous, and referable, directly or by fair implication, to the original promise, and that the loyalty of the woman to her expectation of marriage be unbroken. A woman who abandons her shame and makes a resolution not to return to it, but who does return voluntarily and under no new promise, can hardly be said to be in a position to invoke the unwritten equity which has been voiced in the opinions relied on. Plaintiff left defendant in May, June, or July, 1912, and went to Portland. She says: 'I returned in September. When I returned I went out to my own house at Ross park. Mr. Day called to see me there. He came out there and stayed all night. I hadn't any intention when I came home of living any more with him.' Plaintiff did not exact a renewal of the promise to marry, if any was ever made, and there is no showing of shame or anxiety over her situation for more than four years thereafter, when this suit was brought. Under these facts, it would do violence to every rule of law to say that plaintiff was not bound to bring her action within three years after September, 1912, for at that time, and after a voluntary surrender of her obligation to Hera, she made of herself a willing sacrifice upon the altar of Aphrodite."

II. From last act of intercourse.

The courts of at least two jurisdictions, while recognizing the rule that the Statute of Limitations begins to run from the time of the seduction, hold that seduction may be a continuous act so long as the illicit intercourse is kept up; and that, in such a case, the statute commences to run from the last, and not from the first, act of intercourse. Haymond v. Saucer (1882) 84 Ind. 3; McCoy v. Trucks (1889) 121 Ind. 292, 23 N. E. 93; Gunder v. Tibbits (1899) 153 Ind. 591, 55 N. E. 762; Davis v. Young (1891) 90 Tenn. 303, 16 S. W. 473; Ferguson v. Moore (1897) 98 Tenn. 342, 39 S. W. 341. See the reported case (HEGGIE v. HAYES, ante, 150.)

This rule is now firmly established in Tennessee, although the supreme court of that state first held to the contrary. In Franklin v. McCorkle (1886) 16 Lea (Tenn.) 609, 57 Am. Rep. 244, 1 S. W. 250, it was held that the cause of action accrued, and the statute began to run, when the first act of sexual intercourse occurred. In Davis v. Young (1891) 90 Tenn. 303, 16 S. W. 473, this decision was overruled (one judge dissenting), and it was held that the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run against the plaintiff until the last illegal act is committed. The court said: "The averments that the acts constituting the wrong complained of were committed under a promise of marriage, and that such promise was continued and renewed from time to time to a period less than twelve months before the bringing of the suit, save the bar. Trusting to the good faith of the defendant, and relying upon his promises, the daughter was overreached. The promise continued to influence her, and each yielding must be accredited to the promise. It is not presumable that the promise was meant by the one, and understood by the other, to be carried out and performed immediately after the accomplishment of his first act of defilement, but at some future time. As it was alone upon the faith of the promise that the purpose of the defendant could be achieved, it follows as of course that each successive submission by the daughter was in consideration of that promise, and so understood by the defendant. Therefore, the seduction is made up of the several violations by the defendant, and he will not be permitted to confine her remedy to the first illicit act as the only one of seduction, and, when sued, relieve himself by showing that first act to have occurred more than twelve months before suit brought. Such limitation places it in the power of the unprincipled to effect the ruin of the confiding female, and then, by flattering the confidence and hopes of his victim, persevere in her debauchery at his will, and at last ignore all his cruel deceptions of the meantime, and insult the disgrace he has brought about, by pleading the twelve months' statute as applicable to the first act in his series of villainy. It should never be that one, by confessing his infamy, may, by multiplying the evidences of that infamy, acquit himself from accountability for its consequences. To hold that, under promise of marriage deceitfully made for the purpose of seduction, the first illicit act completes the offense, and the statute then begins to run, is to offer a reward to the unscrupulous to do many wrongs that he may escape the bitter consequences of his deceit, and to have him know that the longer he practises his frauds and imposes upon a trusting woman, the more sure he is of going unwhipped of justice."

The case cited was approved and followed in Ferguson v. Moore (1897) 98 Tenn. 342, 39 S. W. 341, wherein it was held that the statute does not begin to run against the right to maintain an action for seduction under a promise of marriage, so long as the defendant, by acts, promises, and artifices, keeps up the illicit intercourse, as seduction is, in such cases, a continuous act.

In Thompson v. Clendening (1858) 1 Head (Tenn.) 287, it appeared that the defendant, in an action brought against him for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, claimed that the trial court erred in admitting any evidence of sexual intercourse beyond the period of three years from the commencement of the action. The appellate court said: "We do not think so. The whole of the defendant's intercourse with the person seduced, and all the circumstances of the case, are to be regarded as an entire transaction, and are admissible as evidence to the jury, as well in view of the question whether the defendant is the father of the child, as to show the extent of the injury in aggravation of the damages."

The reported case (HEGGIE v. HAYES, ante, 150) follows the rule as established in Tennessee, and holds that the statute does not commence to run against the plaintiff in a civil action for seduction until the last act of illicit intercourse under the promise of marriage has occurred; and that it is immaterial that the contract of marriage was not entered into prior to the first unlawful act.

In Haymond v. Saucer (1882) 84 Ind. 3, the complaint charged that the seduction occurred in July, 1878, and the testimony of the plaintiff showed that the first sexual intercourse occurred in the preceding December, and from this it was insisted that the intercourse had in July following did not constitute a seduction. The court said: "This was a question for the jury. If the subsequent intercourse was the result of the first, and of the promise then made, and of the persuasions then employed, it was a seduction; and, where such successive acts are shown to have occurred under an engagement to marry, the jury may properly regard them as constituting elements of one wrong, consummated in the last act of intercourse."

To the same effect is McCoy v. Trucks (1889) 121 Ind. 292, 23 N. E. 93, wherein the court said: "There is no force in the objection that the complaint on its face shows that the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations. . . . In a case of this character the plaintiff is not confined to evidence of one act, nor to evidence covering one particular day or week, but she has a right to give evidence covering many acts and extending over a considerable period of time. She has a right to show the continued conduct of the defendant towards her."

In Gunder v. Tibbits (1899) 153 Ind. 591, 55 N. E. 762, it appeared that the first act of sexual intercourse occurred March 1, 1892; that the illicit relations continued until about February 1, 1895; and that the action for seduction was brought on March 23, 1896. The court held that the successive acts of sexual intercourse constituted a continuous wrong, "consummated in the last act," and that the action brought within two years of the final act of intercourse was not barred by the two years' Statute of Limitations. The court further said: "If an act is done under any sort of constraint, plain justice forbids the defendant to count the time of his control as a part of the period of limitations. In holding that this civil action is not barred, it may be needless to say that what the rule would be in prosecutions under the Penal Code is not hereby decided."

III. From loss of services.

While it seems to be established that in a civil action for seduction, and not for loss of services resulting therefrom, the Statute of Limitations commences to run from the act of seduction, the courts have differed as to when the statute begins to run in a case where the loss of services is made the gravamen of the action. As the right of action is founded on the relation of master and servant, and not on that of parent and child, the prevailing rule, however, seems to be that the statute does not commence to run until the loss of service has actually occurred.

In Clem v. Holmes (1880) 33 Gratt. (Va.) 722, 36 Am. Rep. 795, it was held that where the only change in the common law made by statute is to dispense with the allegations and proof of loss of services, the plaintiff may still bring his action at common law, making the loss of services the gravamen of the complaint, and when this is done, the limitation is from the loss of service and not from the act of seduction. In that case it appeared that an action was brought by a father for loss of services occasioned by the seduction of his infant daughter, who was in temporary service at the defendant's home when the seduction occurred; that she returned to her father's house, where she was confined and delivered of a child, and that the expense and loss were incurred in nursing and care during that period. The court said that the statute began to run from that period.

In Riddle v. McGinnis (1883) 22 W. Va. 253, it was held that, although the statute dispensed with the necessity of alleging and proving loss of services, no other change was thereby made in the common-law rule; and that it was still necessary to allege that the relation of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and his daughter, and that the father's right of action for loss of services resulting from his daughter's seduction did not accrue until he was deprived of her services. It appeared here that the daughter lived away from her father's home at the time of the seduction, and returned home, and was there confined and nursed. The court held that the statute began to run from that time.

In Wilhoit v. Hancock (1869) 5 Bush (Ky.) 567, it appeared that an action was brought by a father for loss of service resulting from the seduction and impregnation of his daughter, and that the suit was brought within one year from the birth of her child, but not within one year from the act of seduction as provided by statute. The court said: "The first serious question presented is as to the right of the father to recover for the seduction as incident to the loss of service, especially when the suit is not brought within a year from the act of seduction. . . . As no suit at common law could be brought by the parent until loss of service accrued, and the extent of this loss and the incidental expense could not be ascertained until the daughter's recovery, it is most apparent that the perfect right of action did not accrue until the daughter's recovery; for this might be longer or shorter, involving greater or lesser loss of time and expense; hence, the Statute of Limitations could not begin to run on the first attack of sickness, nor even the exact day of the child's birth, but from the mother's recovery. As the action was brought within one year from the child's birth, there can

But in McKay v. Burley (1859) 18 U. C. Q. B. 251, it was held that, in an action by a brother for the seduction of his sister, where the principles of the common law were not interfered with by the statute applicable to a suit by a parent, and the evidence must establish the relation of master and servant, the Statute of Limitations began to run from the time of the seduction, and not from the birth of the child. Robinson, Ch. J., said: "We take it to be undeniable that the Statute of Limitations began to run from the time of the seduction; for the plaintiff could then have brought his action, and need not have waited until the child was born."

In L'Esperance v. Duchene (1850) 7 U. C. Q. B. 146, it was held that a father was not obliged to wait for the birth of a child before bringing an action for loss of services resulting from his daughter's seduction. See to the same effect McIntosh v. Tyhurst (1865) 24 U. C. Q. B. 443.

In Briggs v. Evans (1844) 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 16, it was held that where pregnancy results from the seduction it is not necessary for the father to wait until the birth of the child, to entitle him to maintain an action for the loss of her services.

In Dunlap v. Linton (1891) 144 Pa. 335, 22 Atl. 819, it was held, in an action by a father for the seduction of his daughter, that the cause of action was the seduction, and not the resulting expense of childbirth and support, and that the action was barred when the statutory period of six years had elapsed since her seduction. See also Logan v. Murray (1820) 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 175, 9 Am. Dec. 422.

A somewhat unusual situation was presented in Davis v. Boyett (1904) 120 Ga. 649, 66 L.R.A. 258, 102 Am. St. Rep. 118, 48 S. E. 185, 1 Ann. Cas. 386, wherein it appeared that a father brought an action for the seduction of his minor daughter, alleging that, although the act of seduction was committed on May 2, 1899, it did not come to his knowledge, and he was not injured and damaged thereby, until April 15, 1900. It further appeared that more than two years (the statutory period) had elapsed since the act of seduction had been accomplished before the action was instituted, and if the right of action accrued when the seduction took place, the bar of the statute had attached, unless the plaintiff was debarred or deterred from bringing his action by fraud on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff did not allege that he was debarred from bringing his action within the statutory period, but rested his case, so far as the Statute of Limitations was concerned, squarely on the proposition that the statute would not begin to run until he had knowledge of the seduction; and that no cause of action arose in his favor until that time. It was held that the father's cause of action arose when the act of seduction was complete, and not when he discovered that his daughter had been seduced, and was therefore barred by the two years' Statute of Limitations. The court said: "As our Civil Code provides that seduction is the gist of the action, gives a right of action whether it is followed by pregnancy or not, provides that the mother may bring the action if the father refuses to sue, and that no loss of service need be alleged or proved, it would seem that in any suit for damages consequent upon the seduction of a daughter the cause of action would accrue when the act of seduction was accomplished. But whether the old common-law action still survives in this state, or is superseded by the action for which our statute provides, it is apparent, we think, in the present case, that the action was for the seduction, and not for loss of service consequent thereon. This being true, it is clear that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, as more than two years had elapsed after the right of action accrued before the suit was instituted. . . . Besides, the plaintiff, according to his own showing, had more than thirteen months in which to bring his suit, after he discovered that his daughter had been seduced by the defendant, which is longer than the time limited in some of our sister states in which to bring a suit of this character."

IV. From attainment of majority.

The Statute of Limitations does not commence to run against the right of a minor female to bring an action for her seduction until she arrives at the age of twenty-one years. Morrell v. Morgan (1884) 65 Cal. 575, 4 Pac. 580; Watson v. Watson (1884) 53 Mich. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 111, 18 N. W. 605; Gates v. Shaffer (1913) 72 Wash. 451, 130 Pac. 896.

The rule was laid down in Gates v. Shaffer (Wash.) supra, wherein it was held that the statute begins to run against a female's right to bring an action for her own seduction from the time she reaches the age of twenty-one years, notwithstanding § 8743 of Rem. & Bal. Code provides that "females shall be deemed and taken to be of full age at the age of eighteen years and upwards."

So, in Watson v. Watson (1884) 53 Mich. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 111, 18 N. W. 605, it appeared that an action for seduction was brought against the defendant by his adopted daughter, and that the action was not begun until more than the statutory limitation of six years had elapsed from the time of the alleged seduction. The court said: "The suit, under the statute, might have been brought by some relative for the plaintiff (How. Stat. § 7779); but if it had been it would have been barred. But the person whose family relation to the plaintiff was such as naturally to indicate him as the one to bring suit for such an injury on the plaintiff's behalf was the defendant himself, and gross injustice might result from any rule of law which should make his own inability or unwillingness to take the steps called for by the relation operate to extinguish a right of action for his own misconduct. . . . And when she is an infant at the time of the seduction, and nobody acts for her during her minority, there is the same equity in this case as in any other, that she be allowed a reasonable time after coming of age to decide upon seeking redress."

v.
FREDERICK C. PENNEY et al., Respts.

Minnesota Supreme Court — January 24, 1919.

Mortgage — preservation of junior lien.

1. To preserve any rights under a junior lien, the junior creditor must redeem thereunder from the senior creditor who made the redemption next prior in time, even if he himself be such senior creditor.

— redemption by creditor.

2. The right of a creditor to redeem from a foreclosure sale is purely statutory, and the redemption can be effected only by complying with the requirements of the statute.

— redemption from oneself.

3. If such senior creditor also holds the junior lien next in line, he may redeem thereunder from himself as senior creditor by filing the necessary proofs of such redemption without going through the useless form of paying money to himself; but such redemption operates to satisfy and discharge the debt secured by the senior lien, for the reason that under the statute no redemption can be made without paying such debt.

Headnotes by TAYLOR, C.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County granting new trial of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. L. E. Stetler, for appellant:

The redemption was merely a means of acquiring title to the land in question, and the debt secured by the Moore mortgage could not be canceled by the mere formality of redemption; but the value of the land could be, as far as such value would go.

Ritchie v. Ege, 58 Minn. 291, 59 N. W. 1020; Sprague v. Martin, 29 Minn. 233, 13 N. W. 34.

Messrs. Albee Smith and Frank M. Nye for respondents.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

Defendant owned a tract of land in Hennepin county on which he had given a first mortgage of $1,600, a second mortgage of $2,650, and a third mortgage of $700. He had also given promissory notes to evidence the debts secured by the several mortgages. The first mortgage was foreclosed. Plaintiff held the second and third mortgages. As a creditor holding the second mortgage, plaintiff redeemed from the foreclosure sale. As a creditor holding the third mortgage, he redeemed from the redemption made by himself under the second mortgage.

Thereafter he brought this suit on the notes secured by the mortgages. At the trial he took the position that the value of the land over and above the amount paid to redeem it from the sale under the first mortgage should be applied on the notes, and that he was entitled to recover the amount of the notes less the sum so to be applied thereon. The value of the land, over and above the amount paid to redeem it from the sale, was not sufficient to pay the second mortgage debt in full. Defendant took the position that plaintiff, by his redemption under the third mortgage, had paid and satisfied the debt secured by the second mortgage and was only entitled to recover whatever balance might be found due on the debt secured by the third mortgage. The court submitted the case to the jury in accordance with plaintiff's theory, but subsequently granted a new trial on the ground that this was error, and that the redemption under the third mortgage had satisfied and discharged the debt secured by the second mortgage.

The sole question presented is whether the debt secured by the second mortgage was satisfied and discharged by the redemption under the third mortgage.

The right of a creditor to redeem from a foreclosure sale is purely statutory; and what he must do to effect a redemption,

Mortgage—redemption by

and the rights acquired thereby, are fixed and determined by the statute. Tinkcom v. Lewis, 21 Minn. 132; Cuilerier v. Brunelle, 37 Minn. 71, 33 N. W. 123; State ex rel. Anderson v. Kerr, 51 Minn. 417, 53 N. W. 719; Bartleson v. Munson, 105 Minn. 348, 117 N. W. 512. The statute, after providing that the senior creditor having a lien may redeem by paying the amount for which the land was sold with interest, within five days after the expiration of the year allowed to the owner for redemption, further provides: "Each subsequent creditor having a lien in succession, according to priority of liens, within five days after the time allowed the prior lien holder, respectively, may redeem by paying the amount aforesaid and all liens prior to his own held by the person from whom redemption is made." Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8147.

This statute has been before the court many times, and its purpose and effect are fairly well settled. The purpose is to make the land satisfy the liens on it to as great an extent as possible, and to this end the statute provides for a sort of auction sale among creditors, by giving in turn to the holder of each successive lien the right to pay off prior claims, and by so doing to apply on his own claim any excess in value of the property over and above the amount so paid. Each lien stands by itself, and is cut out unless redemption be made under it. If a creditor who holds two liens redeems under his senior lien and wishes to preserve and enforce his junior lien, he must also redeem under the junior lien, even if it be next in line. The fact that he has redeemed under the senior lien, and also holds the next junior lien, gives him no other or different rights under the junior lien than would be possessed by any other creditor holding such junior lien. Pamperin v. Scanlan, 28 Minn. 345, 9 N. W. 868; Parke v. Hush, 29 Minn. 434, 13 N. W. 668; Buchanan v. Reid, 43 Minn. 172, 45 N. W. 11; Ritchie v. Ege, 58 Minn. 291, 59 N. W. 1020; Bagley v. McCarthy Bros. Co. 95 Minn. 286, 104 N. W. 7.

These decisions establish the doctrine that, in order to preserve any rights under a junior lien, the junior creditor must redeem under it —preservation from the senior creditor who made the redemption next prior in time, even if he himself be such senior creditor. He can do so or not at his option. If he elects to redeem, the statute prescribes what he must do to effect the redemption. Within a year from the date of the sale, he must give notice of his intention to redeem; and at the time of redeeming, he must produce proof of the lien under which he makes the redemption, and of the amount due thereon, and must pay the amount of the claims from which he redeems. These statutory requirements are mandatory. But if the right to redeem under the junior lien is held by the same creditor who redeemed under the senior lien, the redemption payment under the junior lien would be made by such creditor to himself as holder of the rights acquired by the redemption under the senior lien. Of such a situation the court has said: "We are of the opinion that it is not necessary for such creditor redeeming from himself to go through the idle ceremony of paying money to himself," and that placing on file the documents which show that he is entitled to redeem under the junior lien, and has elected to do so, is sufficient to effect the redemption. Ritchie v. Ege, 58 Minn. 291, 59 N. W. 1020. But in no case has it been held that such a redemption operates to tack the debt secured by the junior lien to the debt secured by the senior lien. While the creditor need not go through a useless form, yet if he elects to and does redeem under his junior lien, such redemption operates to satisfy and discharge the debt secured by the senior lien, for the reason that the statute requires the payment of such <sup>—redemption from oneself.</sup> debt in order to effect the redemption. It follows that plaintiff, by redeeming under his third mortgage, satisfied and discharged the debt secured by his second mortgage.

Order affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Redemption by one having two or more liens on same property.

It is provided by statute in some jurisdictions that where property is judicially sold a lien holder may redeem, and any lien holder seeking to avail himself of this right must put himself in the line of redemption by redeeming from all liens prior to his own. See 19 R. C. L. title, Mortgages, pp. 638 et seq.

The reported case (MOORE v. PENNEY, ante, 161) holds that where a person holding two liens on property attempts, by virtue of the junior of his liens, to redeem from a foreclosure sale under a lien prior to both, he must redeem not only from the lien which has been foreclosed, but from his own senior lien. The court holds, following and quoting Ritchie v. Ege (1894) 58 Minn. 291, 59 N. W. 1020, that in such a case the lien holder need not go through the form of paying to himself the amount of his senior lien; but that in all other respects he must comply with the statute with respect to redemption therefrom. In Ritchie v. Ege (Minn.) supra, the failure of the lien holder to file a notice of redemption from his own prior lien was held to be fatal. The court cites, as establishing the rule thus laid down, three earlier cases in the same jurisdiction. Pamperin v. Scanlan (1881) 28 Minn. 345, 9 N. W. 868; Parke v. Hush (1882) 29 Minn. 434, 13 N. W. 668, and Buchanan v. Reid (1890) 43 Minn.

172, 45 N. W. 11. These cases are not within the scope of the present discussion, holding that the purchase by a lien holder of the certificate of sale under a prior lien is not of itself a redemption by him from that sale.

In Bagley v. McCarthy Bros. Co. (1905) 95 Minn. 286, 104 N. W. 7, it appeared that there were two mortgages on a piece of property, and that two judgments in favor of the same person, and docketed at the same time, were also liens thereon, subject to the mortgage. The property was sold under execution issued on one of the judgments, and bid in by the judgment creditor. Thereafter one of the mortgages was foreclosed and the property bid in by the mortgagor. The judgment creditor sought to redeem as such. The case was determined on the ground that his status as a judgment creditor was lost by merger on his purchase at the execution sale. But, assuming for the purpose of argument that the judgment under which the sale was had was prior to the other judgment, the court said by way of dictum: "If the lien of the larger judgment was prior to the lien of the smaller judgment, as the mortgagee contends, the judgment creditor was not entitled to redeem. He failed to 'join the ranks of the redemptioners.' To enable the holder of a second mortgage to preserve his lien under such security, he must have filed his notice of intention to redeem from his foreclosure sale under the first mortgage. Pamperin v. Scanlan (1881) 28 Minn. 345, 9 N. W. 868; Parke v. Hush (1882) 29 Minn. 434, 13 N. W. 668; Buchanan v. Reid (1890) 43 Minn. 172, 45 N. W. 11; Sprandel v. Houde (1893) 54 Minn. 308, 56 N.

W. 34; Ritchie v. Ege (1894) 58 Minn. 291, 59 N. W. 1020. Correspondingly, to preserve the lien of the later judgment after the expiration of the period of redemption from the execution sale under the prior judgment, the judgment creditor must have filed notice of his intention to redeem from that sale." MAREN G. TORGERSON et al., Respts.,

BRITHA HAUGE et al., Appts.

(34 N. D. 646, 159 N. W. 6.)

Will — contract to make.

1. The parents of Andrew Torgerson entered into an oral understanding with him in 1899, whereby he should reside with and care for them during their lives, and should receive their property. They executed and delivered to him their joint written will, constituting him sole devisee of all their property. Andrew purchased an adjoining quarter, sold his own homestead in another county, and for fifteen years lived with his parents.

Andrew died in June, 1914; the father in October following, at the age of seventy-four years. The mother was seventy-four years old at the time of the trial. Andrew leaves a widow and four minor children. Surviving him are these defendants, his four brothers and sisters, and his mother. Six weeks after the death of Andrew, his brothers and sisters procured the aged and enfeebled father and mother to make another will, revoking the former one, and dividing all their property between themselves and the heirs of Andrew, one fifth to each. The parents then leave and reside with the defendants. Andrew's widow protests and offers to continue to support and care for them.

The children of Andrew herein seek to enjoin the probate of the second will and maintain the status quo during the lifetime of the mother; and to define the estate of the minors in the real property, and declare their interest therein a trust upon the fee thereof to be subsequently perfected by the probate of the first will or proceedings in equity; and to annul any pretended interest of the defendants under the purported second will and to make suitable provisions meanwhile for the maintenance and care of the mother out of said homestead premises, title to which was acquired by final proof years ago, but subsequent to the delivery of the first will. Held: A will executed under such an agreement is both contractual and testamentary. Its contractual features cannot be later revoked by the testators without the consent of the beneficiaries, where executed, and where equity should enforce its provisions.

— performance.

2. Under the facts this contract under which said will was executed and delivered was substantially performed, and to such an extent that equity will grant relief equivalent to specific performance and fasten a trust upon the property for the benefit of the heirs of the beneficiary under the contract, as against any transferee or devisee.

3. A will so executed will be recognized in equity as a part performance of the contract, and becomes itself, in its contractual features, an enforceable contract.

4. That the title to the government homestead had not been vested by final proof in the testator when said will and contract was made was immaterial, where subsequently made.

[See 13 R. C. L. 646.]

— effect of statute.

5. Such a contract for transfer and will executed thereunder is not a violation of, but instead is provided for and recognized by, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2291.

— acquiescence — effect.

6. The mother of Andrew having joined in the will and acquiesced for years in the benefits under the contract; no homestead rights of hers are violated by equitable provision for her maintenance from said property or its proceeds. Equity has power, under such circumstances, to award possession as against her to the heirs of Andrew, where ample provision for her maintenance is made, and she refuses to remain with them upon said premises.

7. No rights of the widow of Andrew are involved, she having formally waived any right in said premises to and in favor of her children, these plaintiffs.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Wells County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce a contract made by defendants with plaintiffs' intestate, to devise certain property to him in consideration of support, and to enjoin the probate of a second will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. B. F. Whipple and J. J. Youngblood, for appellants:

An unproved homestead is not devisable by will or contract.

Sutphen v. Sutphen, 30 Kan. 510, 2 Pac. 100; Wood v. Noel, 116 La. 516, 40 So. 857; Ford v. Ford, 24 S. D. 644, 124 N. W. 1108; Cascade Public Service Corp. v. Railsback, 59 Wash. 376, 109 Pac. 1062; Tait v. New York L. Ins. Co. 1 Flipp. 288, Fed. Cas. No. 13,726; Siegel, C. & Co. v. Eaton & P. & Co. 165 Ill. 550, 46 N. E. 449.

Plaintiffs are seeking specific performance of an alleged oral contract. Assuming the contract to have been established, they cannot maintain their action for specific performance because the contract has not been completed.

Prusiecke v. Ramzinski, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 81 S. W. 771.

Messrs. John O. Hanchett and J. L. Johnston, for respondents:

Mortgages executed by homestead entryman prior to proof and patent, where the entryman thereafter perfects his title and obtains patent to the land, are valid.

Adam v. McClintock, 21 N. D. 483, 131 N. W. 394; Martin v. Yager, 30 N. D. 577, 153 N. W. 286; Holtan v. Beck, 20 N. D. 5, 125 N. W. 1048; Sutphen v. Sutphen, 30 Kan. 510, 2 Pac. 100.

An oral agreement to convey real estate by deed or will, when reasonably definite and certain in its terms, and when same has been acted upon and the grantee has gone into possession and erected valuable improvements on the land, with the knowledge of the vendor, is valid and enforceable in law; and an action for specific performance can be maintained in a court of equity for its enforcement.

When a man has given up his inherent right to establish and build a home for himself and family elsewhere, and has, pursuant to such a contract, occupied and for many years improved a tract of land belonging to another, under an agreement to convey it to him by deed or devise it to him by will, the only adequate remedy is by action for specific performance in a court of equity, which will under such circumstances decree specific performance.

Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The quarter section, the subject-matter of this suit, was the government homestead of Torger J. Hauge. It is the southwest quarter of 6, township 149 north of range 71 west, and within Wells county. Torger Hauge made proof thereon in 1902. Britha Hauge, now his widow, is still living. Their children were the defendants other than the widow appellant, and also their youngest son, Andrew Torgerson.

The plaintiffs are his children suing by guardian the mother and the brothers and sisters of their father, Andrew Torgerson. Both Andrew Torgerson and his father, Torger J. Hauge, are dead. The son died from tuberculosis June 5, 1914, after a lingering illness. His father, Torger J. Hauge, died in October following.

In 1899, Torger J. Hauge and his wife were living upon this tract as their unproved government homestead. Andrew Torgerson, their youngest son, unmarried, was residing upon a government homestead near Balfour. The other four children of Torger and wife had married and had left the parental roof. In 1899, the father and mother entered into an arrangement with Andrew that he should return to their home, reside with and care for them for the balance of their lives, and should receive therefor all their property, including their unproved homestead, upon the death of both of them. Andrew thereupon made commutation proof upon his homestead near Balfour and sold it, realizing some $1,500 net from its sale. He immediately returned to the home of his parents, purchasing a quarter of school land adjoining, and making the first payments thereon to the state with a portion of the proceeds from the sale of his homestead. He took possession of all personalty on the father's homestead and cropped it, taking those also. The father soon afterward, in 1902, made proof upon his homestead, and patent therefor presumably has been issued. In 1899 the father's homestead was worth approximately $10 per acre. The buildings were of sod. Substantial frame buildings, consisting of a house worth twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, a large hip-roofed barn, worth from ten to twelve hundred dollars, and several other frame buildings, as granaries and the like, have been built upon the father's homestead by Andrew since his return. There is substantial proof that a portion of the proceeds from the son's homestead went into the frame house, the first building erected. The buildings and improvements, in the aggregate of the value of approximately $3,500, upon the father's homestead, were placed there by Andrew from part of the proceeds of the sale of his homestead, but in larger part from the crops he had raised upon the land in question and the school quarter. All the buildings and improvements were placed upon the father's homestead, instead of upon the school land quarter, and during all the years from 1899 until Andrew's death he had resided thereon.

Andrew married in 1907, and he and his family, together with his father and mother, have always lived there. During all this time the old people had been well and comfortably cared for by the son and his wife, and were apparently well satisfied during these fifteen years with their condition and with the performance of the agreement under which they were maintained. For some years before the son's death in 1914 he had been ailing; but no complaint has been made that during that time and up to his death the old people were not properly cared for. In fact, the contrary is the proof. During all this time peace and harmony prevailed, and at various times the old people have referred to the understanding with Andrew, and declared that his wife and children, in case of his death, should not be dispossessed, but should perform the contract the same as Andrew did when living, and receive the same benefits. They even consented to the giving of a deed for said purposes a few days before Andrew's death; but evidently for sentimental reasons, such as the consideration for the feeling of the son during his last illness, they did not trouble themselves or him to make the transfer.

This original understanding or contract does not rest entirely in parol. Soon after the return of Andrew in 1899, and evidently to carry out the agreement and place it and the good faith of the parties beyond question for all time, the father and mother had a will prepared, and which they executed and attested in the presence of witnesses and subsequently delivered to Andrew. In part, it reads: "We do hereby jointly and severally give, devise, and bequeath to our beloved son, Andrew Torgerson, all our estate whether held jointly or severally, of whatever name, title, or description, real, personal, or mixed. This will to become operative only upon the death of the survivor of us. We do hereby make, constitute, and appoint Andrew Torgerson the forenamed, sole executor of this last will and testament without being required to give bonds for the discharge of his trust as such executor." The possession of this will has been retained at all times by Andrew, and since his death by his widow or the plaintiffs. Its execution and delivery are admitted, and also are established by the uncontroverted proof. Each and all of the defendants knew of its provisions and the arrangement under which the son Andrew, and later his wife, had occupied the premises in question and cared for and maintained the old people. As above stated, the son died first, and at a time when the father was very feeble and in poor health and needed continuous personal attention and care. At Andrew's death his widow was six months pregnant, and physically unable to render all the care to the aged parents of Andrew that was necessary, and was assisted by her sister and other hired help; and several times a week by another son, a brother of Andrew.

Some six weeks after Andrew's death, evidently under prearrangement for the purpose, but without informing Andrew's widow thereof until it occurred, a meeting of the surviving brothers and sisters of Andrew, the defendants in this action, took place at the home of the old people and the widow and children, at which time the father and mother were induced to make a second will, under the provisions of which the father's homestead, still standing of record in his name, was devised to all his children, share and share alike, devising to the three minor children of Andrew only a one-fifth share of this property. Its purpose was to disregard and annul the earlier will, and avoid any rights of the heirs of Andrew under it and the contract entered into in connection therewith, and performed under for more than fifteen years. There is evidence in the record that the father and mother were reluctant to do this, but did it under the solicitation, if not under what amounted to the coercion and duress, of their other four surviving children, these defendants. There is evidence from which to conclude that the old lady and her remaining children, defendants, desired to keep this property from Andrew's widow. And on the same day the aged couple were removed to the residence of one of the defendants. Andrew's widow, realizing the drift that matters were taking, offered to care for the father and mother that they might remain with her, and that she would give them a home and fulfil the contract years before entered into with Andrew, and frequently referred to in conversation with her or in her presence. This they refused to do. Subsequently, the administrator of Andrew's estate made a similar offer, and also offered to contribute a portion of the crops or a monthly allowance for their support, in the performance and fulfilment of said previously existing contract. But this was declined.

Soon afterwards the father died, being some seventy-four years old at the time of his death. The mother was seventy-four at date of trial. This action is brought by Andrew's children by guardians, to enforce said contract by having the property decreed to be held in trust by the mother for her support, but subject to the vested interests therein of the plaintiff's minor children and heirs of Andrew Torgerson, deceased, and that the probating of the second will as establishing title adverse to the interest of plaintiffs be enjoined, and that the interests of the plaintiffs and the widow be defined and declared, and that the other defendants take nothing. At trial the widow of Andrew filed a waiver in favor of her four children, of any interest she might have had in Will-waiver.

said property. The relief asked was granted by the lower court. From its decree the defendants appeal, demanding a trial de novo. On retrial the facts are found as heretofore set forth in this opinion.

The points argued in briefs will now be considered. It is asserted "that it was error to hold that plaintiffs have an estate and vested interest in said real property," and "to hold that prior to his death Torger J. Hauge held the legal title to said land in trust for Andrew's heirs," and "that plaintiffs are entitled to the use, occupation, and possession of said land," and defendants claim that the parents have never waived nor conveyed their homestead rights in said premises, and that the mother, Britha Hauge, "cannot be divested of the absolute use, occupation, and possession of said land by any substitution of other means for her care and support." It is undisputed that a will was made and delivered, and the status of the parties was accordingly changed for fifteen years to conform to and comply with the agreement, the terms of which were definite and specific. The will was executed under and in performance of the original contract, and for a valuable consideration moving to the contracting parties, i. e., the value of the support, care, and maintenance of the aged couple, worth $300 per year under the proof, while the value of the crops and advantages to Andrew, present and prospective, was considerable.

"A will executed under an agreement founded upon a valuable consideration is contractual as well as testamentary. In the latter aspect it may be revoked without the consent of the beneficiary, but not in the former." Syllabus in Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 388, 131 Pac. 147. The opinion also has the following: "An agreement in writing made upon sufficient consideration, to devise real estate, is enforceable by specific performance against the heirs or devisees of the testator. Newton v. Lyon, 62 Kan. 306, 310, 62 Pac. 1000; Bless v. Blizzard, 86 Kan. 230, 120 Pac. 351; Dillon v. Gray, 87 Kan. 129, 123 Pac. 878; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 621"

—also citing and quoting from 36 Cyc. 735, as follows: "An agreement to make a certain disposition of property by will is one which, strictly speaking, is not capable of a specific execution, yet it is within the jurisdiction of a court of equity to do what is equivalent to a specific performance of such an agreement. Such a contract is enforced after the death of the promisor by fastening a trust on the property in the hands of the heirs, devisees, and personal representatives and others —performance. holding the property with notice of the contract, or as volunteers."

"A will duly executed in pursuance of an agreement based upon a valuable consideration becomes itself, in a sense, an enforceable contract. The testator cannot, by making a later will, escape the obligation confirmed by the first one. 40 Cyc. 1068; Schouler, Wills, 3d ed. § 452. The delivery of the will to the beneficiary has been treated as of importance in emphasizing the contractual feature of the transaction. 40 Cyc. 1068, note 2;" Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 388-392, 131 Pac. 147. "There is no dissent in the authorities from the proposition that one may make a valid contract with another to devise or bequeath property by his last will in a certain specified way." Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 Pac. 261. An almost identical contract with this, except that the will had not been delivered to the beneficiary, was nevertheless enforced in like manner in Whitney v. Hay, 181 U. S. 77, 45 L. ed. 758, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537, in an appeal from court of appeals of District of Columbia, in an opinion by Justice Harlan. Therein are found facts closely parallel to here. "His [plaintiff's] plans of life were materially altered in order that he might take care of Piper and wife during their respective lives. Piper put Hay in actual possession of the premises in question, in execution of his agreement with Hay. But he failed to do that which was vital to Hay, namely, to put the absolute title to the property in him. Under all the circumstances, the failure of Piper to invest Hay with the legal title was such a wrong to the latter as entitled him, under the established principles of equity, to the protection which would be given by a decree specifically declaring that the defendant holds the title in trust for him. We are of opinion that such relief is consistent with the objects intended to be subserved by the Statute of Frauds; for the decree in favor of Hay does not charge Piper upon his parol contract with him, but rests upon the equities arising out of the acts and conduct of the parties, subsequent to the making of the original agreement."

Another closely analogous case is Baker v. Syfritt, 147 Iowa, 49, 125 N. W. 998, holding that, "where the will has been made pursuant to a valid contract, the testator cannot, by the act of revocation, escape the obligations of his contract; nor will his heirs take any advantage by such revocation,"—citing Robinson v. Mandell, 3 Cliff. 169, Fed. Cas. No. 11,959; Dufour v. Pereira, 1 Dick. 419, 21 Eng. Reprint, 332; Breathitt v. Whittaker, 8 B. Mon. 530; *Carmichael v. Such is unquestionably the law. Early cases may be found, as Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 305; Snyder v. Snyder, 77 Wis. 95, 45 N. W. 818, and Bourget v. Monroe, 58 Mich. 563, 25 N. W. 514, in apparent conflict, but, upon inspection, are either later overruled or are distinguishable on facts from the one at bar. The legal title to these premises is held in trust for the plaintiffs, whose parents have substantially performed the contract as set forth under the facts.

As to the homestead rights of defendant Britha Hauge, mother, she is shown to have signed and executed the will jointly with her husband, and to have received support for years under reliance by Andrew upon its validity and its being a part performance of the agreement of her husband, fee owner. She should not now be permitted to revoke her will with its contractual provisions performed to her advantage, and to now assert that said contract is invalid. To do so will be equivalent to allowing her to defraud her son's heirs, by revocation of her will and repudiation of her contract. Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 388, 131 Pac. 147; Teske v. Dittberner, 70 Neb. 544, 113 Am. St. Rep. 802, 98 N. W. 57; Engholm v. Ekrem, 18 N. D. 185, 119 N. W. 35; Whitney v. Hay, 181 U. S. 77, 45 L. ed. 758, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537. All that is sought is to sustain her own written instrument, to enforce her own writing according to its terms, and meanwhile to maintain the status quo until it becomes operative. ~~acquiescence—effect.~~ This is no invasion of her homestead rights; on the contrary, they are duly respected and enforced for her benefit.

Appellants urge that the homestead, unproved when the will was executed and delivered, was not devisable by will, or subject to alienation by will or contract under Federal statutes against alienation. On the contrary the Federal statutes recognize the right to make such a devise of an unproved homestead. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2291, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 4532, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 557, declares that "no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until (after) the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if . . . the person making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death, his heirs or devisee," makes final proof, patent issues. It is not an alienation prohibited by the Federal Homestead Act (Newkirk v. Marshall, 35 Kan. 77, 10 Pac. 571), on facts very similar to those at bar. But the point has been ruled upon adversely, denying such contention, in Adam v. McClintock, 21 N. D. 483, 131 N. W. 394, and Martin v. Yager, 30 N. D. 577, 153 N. W. 286. Defendants are estopped to assert such a claim.

Title has vested in the father. The Federal government has had no interest for years in this tract, and it is the only one that could be heard to assert such to be an alienation contrary to law. The wife and these defendants, who seek to claim under the title of the parent, cannot question this vested interest in the son and his heirs on any such ground, where the father himself could not have done so. Adam v. McClintock, supra. Nor can these heirs complain that the first will did not mention themselves. Its contractual features, not its testamentary ones, are before this court. It has become a contract, executed substantially and irrevocably as between sire and son, and is enforceable under all present-day authority.

As a contract it is, valid in equity, though perhaps as a will it would be invalid to operate to disinherit the defendants, they not being therein mentioned. Comp. Laws 1913, § 5667. It is further contended that as the will "runs to Andrew Torgerson only, not to his heirs or devisees," the services to be rendered by Andrew were personal in their character, and this being the fact, no one could be substituted to complete his part of the contract, which was then subject to avoidance by the parents on the death of Andrew before either of them.

None of the cases sustain such a construction. In equity this contract was substantially performed. The father was virtually upon his deathbed when the son died, after fifteen years of observance of its terms. True, the mother, seventy-four years of age, was alive at time of trial, but her expectancy is as short as her mind is enfeebled, as appears from her own testimony. To sustain appellants in this contention would place those who had sustained parents through their period of understanding into a ripe old age of childishness, at the irresponsible caprice of the enfeebled parent, and when such whim has been invited by the perhaps reprehensible conduct of envious relatives, who for such years have shirked filial duties until, in the late twilight of their parents' lives, is seen a chance to profit at the expense of the one who had, for filial reasons, or by valid contract, supported the parents for years.

Neither the contention that the personal care by Andrew, or the fact of his death prior to that of his parents, can bar equitable jurisdiction to indirectly accomplish specific performance by enjoining violation of the contract. "Whether equity will decree the specific performance of a contract rests (entirely) in judicial discretion and always depends upon the facts of the particular case. As a rule when a definite contract to leave property by will has been clearly and certainly established, and there has been performance on the part of the promisee, equity will grant relief, provided the case is free from objection on account of inadequacy, . . . and there are no circumstances or conditions which render the claim inequitable." Syllabus in Anderson v. Anderson, 75 Kan. 117, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 229, 88 Pac. 743. The performance by Andrew was complete until his death. The contract did not specify that his death should forfeit all rights of his heirs or estate obtained under such performance. Equity should not imply or construe such a forfeiture, where none has been stipulated. In fact every equity and circumstance are in favor of enforcement of the contract, the contractual features of the will executed and delivered under it in partial performance of it.

Petition for rehearing denied, August 16, 1916.

ANNOTATION.

Right to revoke will executed pursuant to contract.

- I. Introductory, 172.
- II. General rule, 172.
- III. Illustrations, 173.

I. Introductory.

This note, in discussing the revocability of a will made pursuant to a contract, excludes from consideration the right of revocation where joint or mutual wills are made. It also excludes the right to specific performance of an agreement to give property by will. With respect to cases of that kind it is deemed to be of no importance whether the agreement was broken by failure to make a will, or by the revocation or change of a will once made. The note, therefore, does not review cases like Whitney v. Hay (1901) 181 U. S. 77, 45 L. ed. 758, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537, wherein a contract to devise was enforced after the revocation of a will made pursuant to a contract without reference to that will, but those cases only wherein it was sought to affix a contractual character to the will itself.

II. General rule.

Though a will is made pursuant to a contract, it is revocable in the sense that after revocation it is no longer effective as a will, and if a revoking will is made, that will is admissible to probate. "If one should, under contract, execute a will and covenant not to change it, and afterwards should revoke it, substituting another, the latter only could be admitted to probate as a will; the other party would obtain redress only by securing, at law or in equity, such remedy for breach of the covenant as the rules of those jurisdictions provide." Eggers v. Anderson (1901) 63 N. J. Eq. 264, 55 L.R.A. 570, 49 Atl. 578. So, in Day v. Washburn (1911) 76 N. H. 203, 81 Atl. 474, in granting specific performance, it was said: "The superior court, of course, has no jurisdiction in this proceeding to set up the first will, or to annul the probate had of the later. The decree suggested will not have such effect.

The first will was offered merely as evidence of the contract alleged, and the decree will not affect the probate of the second." In Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 388, 131 Pac. 147, it appeared that a will was executed pursuant to an agreement of the testator to leave all his property to the devisee. It was subsequently revoked by another will. The court affirmed a decree establishing title in the property in the devisee in the first will, but reversed so much of the decree as set aside the second will, holding that the payment of debts and the settlement of the estate must be had under that will. However, in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Holloday (1883) 13 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 16, a will made pursuant to a contract was held to be irrevocable, and a subsequent will attempting to revoke it was canceled as a cloud on title.

But where a will is made in pursuance of a contract resting on a valuable consideration, it loses its voluntary and donative aspect, and becomes itself a contract. "A will duly executed, in pursuance of an agreement based upon a valuable consideration, becomes itself, in a sense, an enforceable contract. The testator cannot, by making a later will, escape the obligation confirmed by the first one." Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 392, 131 Pac. 147.

"When based on a valuable consideration, a paper in form a will may, especially when delivered to a party interested, constitute legally and in fact an irrevocable contract." Bolman v. Overall (1886) 80 Ala. 451, 60 Am. Rep. 107, 2 So. 624.

The general rule is, therefore, that a will executed pursuant to a contract cannot be revoked so as to relieve the testator of its contractual obligation.

South Carolina.—Bruce v. Moon (1899) 57 S. C. 60, 35 S. E. 415.

In Eggers v. Anderson (1901) 63 N. J. Eq. 264, 55 L.R.A. 570, 49 Atl. 578, it appeared that an old woman had been in large part supported by a number of young ladies belonging to a charitable organization. They requested her, in consideration of what they had done and expected to do for her, to make a will in their favor. This she did, but shortly thereafter destroyed it and made another, giving her property to her relatives in Germany. The young ladies continued their charitable assistance until her death. It was held that the agreement was satisfied by the making of the will, and implied no agreement to die testate thereof. But in Bruce v. Moon (1899) 57 S. C. 60, 35 S. E. 415, referring to an attempted revocation of a will made in consideration of support, the court said: "But it is said that A. H. Moon complied with his promise to plaintiff by making his will, giving her all of the property of which he died seised and possessed. This, as it seems to us, we must say, is a mere play upon words. To say that a person has fulfilled his agreement to give to another all of his property at his death, in consideration of valuable services performed, by making his will in accordance with such agreement, and then to turn right around and annul and effectually destroy such testamentary provision by conveying away all of his property to another, leaving nothing whatever upon which the will could operate, would be 'keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope.' Such a mode

Reference has been made to the fact that a will executed pursuant to contract was delivered to the beneficiary or to a third person, as indicating an intent to make it contractual in nature. Padfield v. Padfield (1874) 72 Ill. 322; Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 388, 181 Pac. 147. But the irrevocability of a will thus made is not affected by the fact that it is retained in the possession of the testator. Anding v. Davis (1860) 38 Miss. 574, 77 Am. Dec. 658, wherein the court said: "Nor is this equitable right secured to the complainants impaired by the fact that the will, the instrument of conveyance and the evidence of the agreement, was to remain in the possession of Anding. For after its execution, as agreed on, he had no right to destroy it, without a violation of his agreement. His retention of it was a part of the agreement which he had undertaken, and which he was bound to observe. If he executed and afterwards destroyed it, then it was a violation of his agreement."

So, in Johnson v. McCue (1859) 34 Pa. 180, it was said: "There is an apparent difficulty arising from the fact that the principal writing was not delivered. But the form of the transaction shows that delivery was not intended. The contract was to be complete and perfect without this, and the delivery of the other side of the contract by the other parties, and the subsequent dealings and actual relations of the parties, show that it was complete and perfect. The delivery of the will would make this fact more obvious, but it was not essential to the perfection of the contract."

III. Illustrations.

In Anding v. Davis (1860) 38 Miss. 574, 77 Am. Dec. 658, it appeared that an agreement was made that, in consideration of a conveyance of land, the grantee would, by will, reconvey the land to the grantor. He made a will to that effect, but afterwards destroyed it. A bill to enforce the reconveyance was sustained, the court saying: "Upon that consideration, in part, and for that purpose, he had received the deed, and the agreement had the force of a contract; and the will, when executed, was, as to this property, irrevocable."

In Bolman v. Overall (1886) 80 Ala. 451, 60 Am. Rep. 107, 2 So. 624, it appeared that a will was executed in consideration of services rendered to the testatrix, and was delivered to the executrix therein named. Thereafter the testatrix executed another will, making a different disposition of her property, which was probated. A bill for the specific performance of the terms of the first will was sustained, the court saying that the will was in its essential nature a contract.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Holloday (1883) 13 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 16, it appeared that land was conveyed by a husband to his wife on her agreement to devise it to him should he survive her. She made a will to that effect, but later made a second will, revoking it. Establishing title in the husband, and canceling the second will as a cloud on the husband's title, the court said: "The husband having caused the property to be conveyed to his wife as he agreed, it would be impossible to restore him to his former position, otherwise than through the last will and testament of his wife, by which the title to the land should again become vested in him at her death. To defeat this conclusion, it cannot be insisted that a will is in its nature ambulatory and revocable during the life of the testator. That statement, true in itself, can have no application to a case where the testator had obligated himself by a valid agreement, founded upon a good consideration, which is wholly inconsistent with the making of another will, by which he should attempt to devise the property, the subject of the agreement, to others than the person from whom the consideration proceeded, and to whom he was bound by the terms of the agreement to devise it."

In Johnson v. McCue (1859) 34 Pa. 180, it appeared that a will was made pursuant to a contract, and on the same day a writing was made, expressing the agreement of the devisees to support the testator. It was held that the two writings constituted one contract, and that the will, being part of an arrangement essentially bipartite, was not subject to revocation. See, to the same effect, Conlon v. Conlon (1902) 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 45, wherein it appeared that the testator took from the devisee a bond for a monthly payment during the life of the testator, and that the will and the bond were placed in a sealed envelop and delivered to a third person.

In Smith v. Tuit (1889) 127 Pa. 341, 14 Am. St. Rep. 851, 17 Atl. 995, it appeared that a will was made under an agreement by the devisee to support the grantor. The devisee was put into possession of the property given by the will, and entered on the performance of his part of the contract. It was held that the will thereupon lost its revocability, and became an executed contract. See to the same effect, the same case on second appeal in (1890) 137 Pa. 35, 20 Atl. 579.

In Bruce v. Moon (1899) 57 S. C. 60, 35 S. E. 415, it appeared that a will was made in consideration of an oral agreement to support the testator, which agreement was performed. The testator attempted to revoke the will, by a conveyance of his property to a person who had notice of the contract and will. Holding that the conveyance was void, the court said: "Both upon principle and authority, we have no doubt that A. H. Moon could not defeat the testamentary provision made for the plaintiff in his will, by the conveyance. To allow A. H. Moon, after having received and enjoyed the consideration upon which his promise to give his property, at his death, to the plaintiff, rested, and after having, in recognition of such promise, actually executed his will to that effect, to defeat such testamentary provision by this conveyance to his son, would be a palpable fraud on the plaintiff, which a court of equity should not and will not tolerate. The view which we have adopted is fully sustained by the authorities in our own state as well as elsewhere. While it is undoubtedly true that a person may, within the limitations prescribed by statute which have no application here, dispose of his property, either by deed or will, in any way that he sees proper, yet this right, like all others, may be bargained away by a valid contract."

In Padfield v. Padfield (1874) 72 Ill. 322, it appeared that a will was executed pursuant to a contract and delivered to a third person. It was held that an irrevocable trust was thereby created. The court said: "The fact that he had the right to make another will, and revoke the one made in the first instance, did not change the character of the trust established or the rights acquired under it."

So, in Huffine v. Lincoln (1916) 52 Mont. 585, 160 Pac. 820, it appeared that a wife contemplated a conveyance to her children, but agreed to convey to her husband on his agreement to devise the property to them. He made a will to that effect, but on his remarriage revoked it. The court declared a trust in favor of the children, saying: "It is argued that inasmuch as he made the will and inasmuch as his later revocation of it was perfectly legal, if not actually commanded by his subsequent marriage, no trust can be said to exist because there was no fraud. This is too narrow a view of the transaction."

In Nelson v. Schoonover (1913) 89 Kan. 388, 131 Pac. 147, it appeared that a wife agreed to give by will to her husband all property of which she died seised. A will was executed pursuant to that contract. Thereafter she made another will, giving half her property to the husband and half to a son. In an action by the husband it was held that he was entitled to a decree vesting the title to all the property in him.

528; 76 Am. Dec. 673, evidence of an antenuptial agreement, by which the husband promised to give by will to his wife all the property received from her on the marriage, was offered in aid of the interpretation of the husband's will. In holding the evidence to be admissible, though not for that purpose, the court said: "It is true that the evidence was offered, not for the purpose of enforcing such antenuptial contract, but for the purpose of sustaining or aiding the construction put on the will and codicil by the defendant. The evidence was not competent for that purpose, as there was no ambiguity about the will or codicil. The import was plain and obvious, giving to the widow only a life estate in the property in controversy; but the evidence was admissible for the purpose of setting up and enforcing such antenuptial contract. If it was true that the testator did make such antenuptial agreement, and his admissions are competent to prove it, and he had this will written in accordance with such agreement, and kept it by him for that purpose, this was such a part performance of the agreement as took the case out of the Statute of Frauds, even if it was within the statute, which, in the opinion of the court, is very doubtful. And when the testator signed and executed that will, it became a fully executed one, and could not be altered by any codicil or subsequent will that he could make."

In Johnston v. Myers (1908) 138 Iowa, 497, 116 N. W. 600, it appeared that a contract was made whereby all the property of the promisor was to be left to the promisee. A will made pursuant thereto devised a certain lot. The promisee sued for damages for breach of the contract. It was held that he had no lien on the lot.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John T. Bottom for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Robert M. Work and J. A. Fowler, for defendants in error:

It was not necessary to call the sureties before declaring the forfeiture of the bond.

Ingram v. State, 10 Kan. 630.

Where an act is done in the exercise of an official duty by one holding that office, it is not necessary to add to his signature a designation of his office, to make the act valid.

In the absence of a statute it is not necessary to give the court jurisdiction to call the sureties.

Ingram v. State, supra.

The court has power to cause the bond to be renewed or dismissed, and the continuance of the bond for the term does not discharge the sureties.

A recognizance or bail bond in general requires three things: To appear and answer, to stand and abide the judgment of the court, and not depart without leave of the court,—and each of these particulars is distinct and independent.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action wherein the plaintiff in error is sued as surety upon a bail bond. Upon trial the court found the issues of law and of fact for the plaintiff and against the defendant. The plaintiff in error, defendant below, duly filed his motion for new trial. Before the motion for new trial was disposed of, and at the hearing thereon, the defendant showed to the court that he had surrendered the principal to the sheriff, and had paid the costs which had accrued in the criminal action in which the bail bond had been given, and also the costs in this action. The facts thus shown were admitted by plaintiff.

It is now contended by plaintiff in error that the trial court erred in failing to dismiss the action after the showing above mentioned was made. The plaintiff in error was entitled to be discharged from liability upon the bail bond if he surrendered the principal, who was the defendant in the criminal case, before judgment was rendered in this action. Huston v. People, 12 Colo. App. 271, 55 Pac. 262. The defendant in error, however, insists that at the time of the surrender of the principal the judgment in this action had been rendered.

At the time the principal was surrendered by the surety in the instant case, no judgment had been entered against the surety. The record shows that, at the conclusion of the trial of this case, the trial judge employed the following language: "At this time the court finds generally the issues of law and fact in this case for the plaintiff, and orders that judgment be entered against the defendant on the bond in question in the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon from the 9th day of October, 1912, and for costs. Let the record show the exception of the defendant to the findings, and order for judgment and the judgment to be entered thereon. Ten days given in which to file a motion for a new trial. The entry of judgment will be stayed during that time. If a motion be filed, entry of judgment will be further stayed until the final disposition of the motion for a new trial."

The foregoing did not amount to a rendition of a judgment, but was merely the announcement of the decision of the court. The term, "judgment," as used in the statute, § 2075, Mills's Anno. Stat. 1912 (Rev. Stat. 1908, § 1918), relieving sureties upon the surrender of the principal, means a judgment as ordinarily defined, and, as defined in § 221, Mills's Anno. Code, "the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action." Such final determination, according to the record in this case, would not take place until after the motion for a new trial was disposed of. Prior to that time there was no judgment either rendered or entered. The court merely found the issues of law and of fact in favor of the plaintiff. The findings of a court do not constitute a judgment. McKnight v. Ballif, 45 Colo. 138, 100 Pac. 433.

The trial court, therefore, erred in assuming that it had rendered a judgment before the principal was surrendered by the surety, and in failing to dismiss the case upon the showing by the surety, prior to surety to discharge.

rendered the principal, who was the defendant in the criminal case, before judgment was rendered in this action.

Judgment—what is.

November 1, 1916, when the court ordered judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, that he had surrendered the principal and paid the costs in the criminal case and in the case at bar.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

NOTE.

The general subject of the surrender of the principal by sureties on a bail bond is considered in the annotation beginning at page 180. The question as to when the right to surrender is terminated is discussed at pages 189 et seq. of that annotation.

v.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS of Reno County et al.

Bail — custody on other charge — effect — surrender.

1. A person who is out on bail under a criminal charge in one county, and who is arrested by a constable from another county under a criminal charge filed in the latter county, cannot be taken from the custody of the constable, without his consent, by the sureties on the bail of the person charged, and be surrendered to the sheriff of the first county, so as to release such sureties.

2. Under the circumstances mentioned in the first paragraph of this syllabus, after being released from the charge filed against him in the latter county, it is the duty of such person to appear at the proper time for trial in the first county, and it is the duty of the sureties on his bail to produce him for that trial.

Appeal — refusal to submit questions.

3. It is not error to refuse to submit to a jury special questions which would not, if answered, elicit any fact that could affect the judgment to be rendered.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Reno County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover an amount deposited with the clerk of the court in lieu of bail, for the appearance of one charged with the crime of grand larceny. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Lee Monroe for appellant.

Messrs. H. E. Ramsey and E. T. Foote, for appellees:

There was a defect of parties in the action, and Sanders was a necessary party. The money is presumed to have been his property.

Re Flack, 88 Kan. 616; 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 807, 129 Pac. 541, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 789.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered against her and in favor of the defendants for costs. The plaintiff seeks to recover $2,000 which had been deposited with the clerk of the district court of Reno county by O. H. Dorr in lieu of bail for the appearance of one John Sanders, who was then charged with grand larceny. This is the second time that this action has been before this court. Campbell v. Reno County, 97 Kan. 68, 154 Pac. 257, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 538. There a judgment in favor of the defendants was reversed, and the cause was remanded for further proceedings. A detailed statement of the facts was made in the former opinion.

On the trial from which the present appeal was taken, the jury answered special questions, a part of which are as follows:

Q. 5. Did the constable from Cowley county have Sanders in his custody at the time it is claimed a surrender was made?

A. Yes.

Q. 6. Did the constable from Cowley county, at the time it is claimed a surrender was made, with a view of effecting a surrender, give Sanders his liberty and allow him to pass into the custody of Carl Duckworth through a surrender by O. H. Dorr?

A. No.

Q. 7. Were the officers from Reno county holding Sanders all of the time he was in their custody, on the date in question, for the constable from Cowley county?

A. Yes.

Other than as modified by the special findings of the jury, the facts now presented are the same as those presented on the former hearing in this court.

1. The first question presented by the plaintiff (who has succeeded to Dorr's rights) is: "Could Sanders be effectively surrendered so as to entitle Dorr to reclaim his deposit without the consent and concurrence of the Cowley county constable?"

The plaintiff argues that the fact that John Sanders was in the custody of the constable from Cowley county could not and did not prevent Dorr from surrendering Sanders to the sheriff of Reno county, and thereby release the $2,000 which had been deposited with the clerk of the district court of that county. If Sanders was surrendered, so that the sheriff had control and custody of him, and could have held him as against the constable, then the $2,000 was released. Before the surrender, or attempted surrender, Sanders had been arrested by the constable from Cowley county, and, under the findings of the jury, was continuously thereafter in the custody of that constable. At the time of his arrest by the constable, Sanders was out on bail. The sheriff had no right to take him out of the custody of the constable. It follows that neither Sanders nor his sureties had any right to deprive the constable of the custody of Sanders by surrendering him to the sheriff.

Bail—custody on other charge —effect—surrender.

2. The plaintiff argues that, when Sanders was released by habeas corpus proceedings in Cowley county, it was the duty of the state to secure an order from the judge of the district court of that county remanding Sanders to the custody of the sheriff of Reno county. The answer to this argument is that Sanders was not in the custody of the sheriff of Reno county when he was arrested by the constable. The sheriff did not have custody of Sanders on the charge filed against him in Reno county after he had been released on bail. When he was released in Cowley county, he was discharged from the custody of the officers in that county, and was given his freedom to the same extent as he had enjoyed that freedom when he was taken into custody by the constable. When Sanders was released in Cowley county, he was again out on bail awaiting his trial in Reno county. The action against him in that county had been continued to the September term of the district court. When that action was called for trial, the state did not have Sanders in custody anywhere, and was not preventing his appearance, and was not preventing his sureties from producing him for trial. The authorities seem to be almost unanimous in holding that, after he was released in Cowley county, it was his duty to appear for trial in Reno county, and his sureties were then under obligation to produce him for that trial. Note in Ann. Cas. 1912C, 747.

prisoner.

3. The plaintiff asked the court to submit to the jury the following questions:

"(1) What, if anything, was said by O. H. Dorr in the office of the clerk of the district court of Reno county, just prior to the drawing of the check sued on herein, about surrendering John Sanders to Carl Duckworth, deputy sheriff, and to whom were such words spoken?"

"(2) What, if anything, was said by John Sanders at the office of the clerk of the district court of Reno county, Kansas, on the day the check sued on was drawn and shortly prior to such drawing on the subject of a surrender of said Sanders to Carl Duckworth, deputy sheriff, and to whom were such words spoken?"

These questions were refused. There was no error in refusing them. Questions are submitted to establish facts, not evidence. If these questions had been submitted, and had been answered, as the plaintiff evidently anticipated they would be answered, those answers would not have established any fact on which judgment could have been rendered, or which could have affected it. The answers might have been the basis for argument concerning the truth of other facts which should have been considered in rendering judgment.

to submit questions.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied October 18, 1918.

ANNOTATION.

Surrender of principal by sureties on bail bond.

- I. Right to surrender principal generally, 180.
- II. Right to arrest for purpose of surrender:
  - a. In general, 184.
  - b. Who may arrest, 186.
  - c. Necessity of process, 188.

I. Right to surrender principal generally.

The modern system of bail is a development of "an ancient and extremely vigorous form of suretyship or hostageship, which rendered the surety liable to suffer the punishment that was hanging over the head of the released prisoner." 2 Pollock & M. History of English Law, p. 589. The principal is, therefore, considered as committed to the custody of his bail.

II.—continued.

- d. Arrest in foreign jurisdiction, 188.
- III. Termination of right to surrender, 189.
- IV. Sufficiency of surrender:
  - a. In general, 191.
  - b. To whom made, 196.
- V. Effect of surrender, 197.

From this responsibility they are at liberty to release themselves at any time by surrendering the principal into the custody from which he was taken by the giving of bail.

"The bail have their principal always upon a string, and may pull the string whenever they please, and render him in their own discharge." Anonymous (1704) 6 Mod. 231, 87 Eng. Reprint, 982.

"When bail is given the principal is regarded as delivered to the custody of his sureties. Their dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment." Taylor v. Taintor (1873) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 366, 21 L. ed. 287.

In State v. Schenck (N. C.) supra, it was said: "At common law, when bail was given, and the principal relieved from the custody of the law, he was regarded, not as freed entirely, but as transferred to the friendly custody of his bail. They had a dominion over him, and it was their right, at any time, to arrest and deliver him again to the custody of the law, in discharge of their obligation."

In People use of Masterson v. Hathaway (1903) 206 Ill. 42, 68 N. E. 1053, affirming (1902) 102 Ill. App. 628, it was said: "The obligation of the bail in this class of cases is to produce the principal before the court upon demand, and at any and all times surrender him up in accordance with its mandates. But this obligation is one of which the bail may be relieved at any time by a voluntary surrender of the principal. In contemplation of law the principal is in the custody of his bail, who may take him where he pleases, and detain him or surrender him in court into the custody of the sheriff who has process against him, or, if the bail concludes his principal meditates flight, or for any reason desires no longer to be held responsible for the appearance of the principal, he may cause him to be imprisoned in the common jail of the county, and thus exonerate himself from his obligation."

Though the bail acted under a mistake of fact in surrendering the principal, the latter is not entitled, on showing the mistake, to be again released on the bond. Wiggins v. Tyson (1901) 112 Ga. 744, 38 S. E. 86, wherein it appeared that the bail surrendered the principal in the belief that they were bound to do so, whereas in fact the remittitur on an appeal had not yet been sent down. The court said: "It is true that the reason given for the surrender was that Wiggins and his bondsmen supposed that the sheriff had legal authority to take and carry Wiggins to the penitentiary. It matters not what reasons may actuate a surety in the surrender of his principal; if he in fact surrenders him, and such surrender is made in the manner provided by law, without regard to his reasons or the motives which actuated him, the surety is discharged from further liability on the bond."

In State v. Anderson (1903) 119 Iowa, 711, 94 N. W. 208, it appeared that a person arrested on a charge of felony executed an individual bond in the sum of $1,500, which sum his father deposited with the clerk of the court, and he was released pending the trial. He was convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, and also to pay the cost of the prosecution, which amounted to $476, and his bail pending an appeal was fixed at $3,000. The accused surrendered himself, and his father moved for the release of the $1,500, which motion the prosecuting attorney opposed on the ground that the money was to be applied towards the payment of the costs. Thereafter the appeal from the judgment of conviction was perfected, and one Reno became surety on the bail bond for $3,000, and on the same day the court granted the motion for the release of the $1,500. The order was complied with. Later Reno took the accused before the sheriff and surrendered him and obtained a receipt for him from the sheriff, and moved for the exoneration of his bail bond. This motion the prosecuting attorney opposed on the ground that the giving of the appeal bond was merely a fraudulent scheme to obtain the prior deposit of $1,500. The trial court sustained this contention, but the ruling was set aside on appeal. The supreme court said: "The surety has, under the statute, an absolute right 'at any time' before the forfeiture of the bond to surrender the defendant and be released. Code, § 5528. That right becomes perfect the moment the bond is accepted and the defendant discharged from custody, and continues until a forfeiture of the undertaking has been declared or the conditions of the bond have been performed. If we are to say that a surrender within an hour is proof of fraudulent intent, who shall say at what particular point of time it may be made without bearing the badge of bad faith? It is said that the admitted circumstances are such that we may assume the bond was given with a preconceived purpose to surrender the defendant. Such purpose, if it existed, is not necessarily fraudulent. It may often happen that bail is given to allow defendant brief respite for business or other reasons, and with the express intent to surrender him as soon as that end is accomplished, whether the interval be months, days, or hours; and such transaction would violate neither the letter nor the spirit of the law. The only purpose of the bond is to secure the production of the defendant in execution of the judgment from which he appeals, and if that condition be performed the law is satisfied, without regard to the time such obligation is in force. But assuming that in the present instance the bond was given with no other purpose than to enable Walter F. Anderson to secure the release of the deposit, is the state in any manner 'defrauded' by the subsequent surrender of the defendant? It is not questioned that the giving of the bond 'in good faith' would have made the right to a refund of the money absolute, nor is it disputed that in such case Reno would have had the right at any time, pending the appeal to this court, to release himself from liability upon the bond by giving the defendant back into custody. Now, if he may terminate his liability at any time by pursuing a line of action prescribed by the statute, it seems clear that the state suffers no legal injury or wrong because he avails himself of that right pursuant to a secret purpose existing in his mind at the time he signed the bond. In other words, so long as he does only that which the statute expressly authorizes him to do, it is not within the province of the court to make the motive which inspires his act a reason for denying him the right which such statute gives. The force of these suggestions is seen when we note the provision in the court's order by which, if Reno pays the $476 into court, it may again be released by giving another bond 'in good faith.' Let us suppose these terms are accepted, and another bond given in the utmost good faith, and thereafter the surety, having good reason to believe the defendant is liable to abscond, surrenders him as provided by law; certainly it cannot be said, in the absence of a statute requiring it, that, in addition to the surrender, he must also restore the deposit, as a condition of the exoneration of his bond. The undertaking of a surety upon an appeal from a conviction of a felony is that 'the defendant will surrender himself in execution of the judgment and direction of the supreme court, and in all respects abide the orders and judgment of the supreme court upon the appeal.' He does not undertake to pay the costs of prosecution in either court. If the judgment appealed from is affirmed, and the defendant is surrendered by the surety, or voluntarily surrenders himself, in execution of the judgment against him, and of the orders of the supreme court, the bond has spent its force and should be discharged. A surrender made in advance of the judgment upon appeal has precisely the same effect. The surety thereby does all he undertook or promised to do, and his exoneration cannot be denied as a means of compelling him to perform an act or duty not 'nominated in the bond.'"

In Kellogg v. State (1870) 43 Miss. 57, it appeared that one indicted for larceny gave a bail bond, on which one Jones was surety, and was released. He was tried and convicted, but he obtained a new trial and remained at liberty under the bail. However, Jones became uneasy and surrendered his principal to the sheriff. The latter accepted the surrender and exonerated the surety. Thereafter one Kellogg became surety. The sheriff let the accused out pending the new trial. When the case was called for trial the principal did not appear. The second bail bond was declared forfeited and later a final judgment was rendered thereon. Kellogg made a motion to set the judgment aside on the ground that the sheriff had no right to accept the surrender of the principal from Jones, the original surety. This contention was held to be untenable, the court saying: "That sureties in criminal cases can surrender their principal in this and other states, as well as in England, is well established, both in law and practice, and that the sureties are thus released from continued liability is equally well settled. An eminent author, quoting Hawkins, P. C., says: 'A man's bail are looked upon as his jailers of his own choosing, and the person bailed is, in the eye of the law, for many purposes, esteemed to be as much in the prison of the court by which he is bailed, as if he were in the actual custody of the proper jailer.' The same author also says: 'A person who is bail may arrest his principal anywhere.' 'So also the right of a man who is bail to surrender his principal, and thus discharge himself, exists with us.' A learned judge of Massachusetts said: 'In legal contemplation, a prisoner, notwithstanding he is bailed, remains in the custody of the persons who became his bail, and they have a right, at any time, to discharge themselves by a surrender of their principal.' The mode of making, and the officer to whom to make the surrender, are specially pointed out by statute in most of the states. It may be laid down as a general rule that the surrender should be made to an officer authorized to admit to bail, or to commit to jail."

In Harp v. Osgood (1842) 2 Hill (N. Y.) 216, the action was to recover on a written promise made by a third person to pay a certain sum of money to a surety in case the principal made default in appearance. It appeared that the principal after his release on bail went to Virginia, where he engaged in certain contracting work. When his case was called he failed to appear. The surety obtained a copy of the bond and delivered the same to a constable, with instructions to arrest the principal. The constable went to Virginia, but on arriving there found that the principal's wife was in a delicate situation, and that if he were to leave Virginia at that time he would sustain great damage in his contract works. The parties, therefore, entered into an arrangement whereby the principal paid to the constable his traveling expenses and the defendant executed the following written instrument: "For value rec'd I promise to pay to George Harp or order the sum of $200 by the 1st of January next. This is, provided Charles H. Chapman does not make his appearance at the Oct. court of Madison county, N. Y. in 1837. Amherst, May 21, 1837. (Signed) J. C. Osgood." The principal remained in Virginia and later failed to appear as agreed. It was held that the constable could maintain the action for and on behalf of the surety. The court said: "Bail may surrender their principal in criminal as well as in civil cases, and may be discharged from their recognizance. . . . Although the plaintiff was a constable in this state, he was not acting in his official capacity in making the arrest in Virginia. He went there as the mere agent or deputy of the bail; and the statute against taking securities colore officii has nothing to do with the case. The undertaking was not void as being against public policy. Chapman was not suffered to remain in Virginia for the purpose of enabling him to escape public justice, but because it was extremely inconvenient, both on account of his family and his business, to come to this state at that time. Under such circumstances he was allowed to go at large, on procuring security that he would appear in court at a subsequent day. The power of the bail was not used oppressively for the purpose of extorting money from the principal, but for the sole purpose of securing an indemnity to the bail."

In Carr v. Sutton (1912) 70 W. Va. 417, 74 S. E. 239, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 453, it appeared that one Sutton was arrested, charged with the commission of a felony. Carr became surety on Sutton's bail bond. Thereafter Sutton and several others entered into an indemnity bond to Carr in case he suffered any loss from his undertaking. But it further appeared that Carr negligently allowed Sutton to escape, although he was requested by the sureties on the indemnity bond to arrest Sutton and surrender him. It was held that Carr could not recover on the indemnity bond, the court saying: "But while the obligation of Carr thus assumed was great, his power over Sutton, given by § 8, chap. 156, Code 1906, as well as by the common law, was also great. By said § 8 he was entitled at any time on application to the clerk to a bailpiece, authorizing him or his agent, at any time, and at any place, within or without the state, and without further process, to arrest Sutton so delivered to bail and commit him to jail. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 708, and cases cited from numerous states. Moreover, the law is, that when the obligation of bail is assumed the surety becomes in law the jailer of his principal, and his custody of him is but a continuance of the original imprisonment, and though he cannot actually confine him he is subrogated to all the other rights and means which the state possesses, to make his control of him effective."

The case of Re Bauer (1892) 112 Mo. 231, 20 S. W. 488, arose under a Missouri statute (Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4130) which reads as follows: "When a bail desires to surrender his principal, he may procure a copy of the recognizance from the clerk, by virtue of which the bail, or any person authorized by him, may take the principal in any county within this state." It was held that a surety has the right to surrender his principal even where the latter is out on bail pending an appeal from the conviction and sentence for a felony, such as perjury. But in the case of Re Griswold (1880) 13 R. I. 125, it was held that a surety on a bail bond in a criminal action could not surrender his principal, as the Rhode Island statute gives this right only to a surety on a civil or special bail bond. In Talley v. State (1902) 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 162, 69 S. W. 514, it was held that a surety on a recognizance given for the perfecting of an appeal could not surrender the principal and so be released from his undertaking. That decision was overruled in Ex parte Cobb (1913) 69 Tex. Crim. Rep. 473, 154 S. W. 997, wherein it was held that the right to surrender exists in case of a bail bond given pending an appeal to the same extent as in case of one given for the appearance of the accused at the trial.

In Iowa, it is held that bail on an appeal from a judgment imposing a fine only cannot exonerate themselves by surrendering the principal, but are responsible for the payment of the fine. State v. Stommel (1893) 89 Iowa, 67, 56 N. W. 263; State v. Meier (1895) 96 Iowa, 375, 65 N. W. 316.

II. Right to arrest for purpose of surrender.

a. In general.

To effectuate their right of surrender the bail have the right to arrest the principal. See the cases cited throughout this subdivision. The scope of the right to arrest was stated obiter in Turner v. Wilson (1875) 49 Ind. 581, as follows: "It is also insisted that a surety in a bastardy prosecution has no lawful right to deliver up his principal and be released from liability on his bond. There is no difference in a bastardy case in this respect from any other case. The rule is the same in criminal and civil cases. Gray v. Fulsome (1835) 7 Vt. 452; State v. Thompson (1856) 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 365; Blood v. Morrill (1845) 17 Vt. 598; Simmons v. Adams (1848) 15 Vt. 677; Mather v. Clark (1827) 2 Aik. (Vt.) 209. The common-law right, as between the parties, of a bail to take his principal at any time, at any place, and under any jurisdiction, has remained unimpaired during more than two centuries. In the quaint language of the old books, 'the bail have their principal always upon a string, and may pull the string whenever they please, and render him in their own discharge.' In this country, for anything the principal can complain of, the bail may, by virtue of his piece, take him in any house or place, in any county, state, or territory, on Sunday or any other day, in the nighttime, or at any time, and, upon demand, may break open doors. He may call persons to assist him, and they will be justified by his command." So in Taylor v. Taintor (1873) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 866, 21 L. ed. 287, it was said: "When bail is given, the principal is regarded as delivered to the custody of his sureties. Their dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment. Whenever they choose to do so, they may seize him and deliver him up in their discharge; and if that cannot be done at once, they may imprison him until it can be done. They may exercise their rights in person or by agent. They may pursue him into another state; may arrest him on the Sabbath; and, if necessary, may break and enter his house for that purpose." See to the same effect Cain v. State (1876) 55 Ala. 170; Hawk v. State (1887) 84 Ala. 466, 4 So. 690.

In Com. v. Brickett (1829) 8 Pick.

(Mass.) 138, the court said: "By the common law the bail has the custody of the principal, and may take him at any time, and in any place. 2 Highmore, Bail, 199, and the cases there cited. The taking is not considered as the service of process, but as a continuation of the custody which had been, at the request of the principal, committed to the bail. The principal may, therefore, be taken on Sunday. The dwelling house is no longer the castle of the principal, in which he may place himself to keep off the bail. If the door should not be opened on demand at midnight, the bail may break it down, and take the principal from his bed, if that measure should be necessary to enable the bail to take the principal."

In United States v. Keiver (1893) 56 Fed. 422, it was said, arguendo: "The bail have the custody of the principal, and may take him at any time or in any place. His dwelling is no longer his castle, as against the right of the sureties, but may be entered at any time of day or night, and on a Sunday as well as on a week day."

In State v. Dwyer (1896) 70 Vt. 96, 39 Atl. 629, it was said, obiter, that the bail may use as much force as is necessary to take and bring in the principal.

In making the arrest the bail is entitled to break the outer door of a dwelling to enter the premises where the principal is. Nicolls v. Ingersoll (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 145, wherein it was said: "Another question presented was whether the bail had a right to break open the outer door of the plaintiff's house to make the arrest. The verdict authorizes us to presume that a demand was made before entry; for this fact was submitted to the jury as being necessary to be shown by the defendant, to render the entry lawful. That the bail may break open the outer door of the principal, if necessary, in order to arrest him, follows, as a necessary consequence, from the doctrine that he has the custody of the principal; his power is analogous to that of the sheriff, who may break open an outer door to take a prisoner who has escaped from arrest." So, in Sheers v. Brooks (1792) 2 H. Bl. 120, 126 Eng. Reprint, 463, Lord Loughborough said: "This plea appears to me to be good, both in form and substance. It shows that the defendants were bail, and not mainperners, for it states that they duly became bail and entered into a recognizance, the legal effect of which is that the principal was in their custody; and a further averment of his being delivered to them would have been unnecessary: when a party is bailed, the bail have a right to go into the house of the principal, as much as he has himself; they have a right to be constantly with him, and to enter when they please, to take him. And I see no difference between a house of which he is solely possessed, and a house in which he resides by the consent of another." See also the dictum in the cases quoted supra in this subdivision.

The bail may arrest the principal on a Sunday and confine him till the next day, and then surrender him. Anonymous (1704) 6 Mod. 231, 87 Eng. Reprint, 982.

An exemption of a bankrupt from "all arrests, restraints, or imprisonments of his creditors" while in attendance on the commissioners in bankruptcy does not deprive the sureties on a bail bond of the right to arrest him for the purpose of surrender. Ex parte Gibbons (1747) 1 Atk. 238, 26 Eng. Reprint, 158.

Where the condition of the bond has been performed and the bail thereby exonerated, their power to arrest the principal terminates. Spillman v. People (1885) 16 Ill. App. 224. In that case it appeared that the principal was in court when judgment was rendered against him, and was committed. Thereafter sentence was suspended. At a later date it was sought to enforce the sentence, and the principal could not be found. A judgment was thereupon rendered against the bail. On their motion to set it aside, it was objected that they must first produce the principal. The court said: "As long as the surety remains bound for the appearance of his principal, just so long, but no longer, has he a right to arrest him and to surrender him to the court. But as soon as the recognizance has spent its force and become functus officio, then, as between him and his surety, the principal is a free man and no longer liable to arrest. If the record of conviction, commitment, and subsequent suspension of the sentence is true as set forth in the motion, then the recognizance was no longer in force, and the surety had no power over the principal to bring him into court."

So, after the time within which the surety may exonerate himself as of right by surrendering the principal has expired, his right to arrest is terminated. Com. v. Johnson (1849) 3 Cush. (Mass.) 454.

The bail may deputize another person to arrest the principal. State v. Mahon (1842) 3 Harr. (Del.) 568; Salles v. Werner (1912) 171 Ill. App. 96; Harp v. Osgood (1842) 2 Hill (N. Y.) 216; Boardman v. Fowler (1800) 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 413; State v. Lingerfelt (1891) 109 N. C. 775, 14 L.R.A. 605, 14 S. E. 75.

In Nicolls v. Ingersoll (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 145, supra, the court said: "I see nothing, on general principles, against allowing this power to be exercised by an agent or deputy; and no case is to be found where the right has been denied. It is a general rule of law, even with respect to public officers, that their ministerial acts may be performed by deputy; and with respect to private individuals, the law recognizes the act of an authorized agent as equal to that of the principal; and there is no principle of policy which renders it necessary to make this case an exception."

The person empowered by the bondsman to arrest the principal may not delegate his authority. State v. Mahon (Del.) supra, wherein the court said: "The arrest must be by the bail himself or by his immediate deputy in writing. Either the bail or his deputy may call in the aid of others in making the arrest; but such aid must be rendered in the presence of the person authorized to make the arrest. This presence need not in all cases be an actual bodily presence, but in every case the bail or deputy must be at the moment engaged in or about the arrest, and the other person acting merely in his aid. As when the bail, pointing out the principal, calls on another to seize him, the arrest would be good, even though at the moment of the arrest the parties might be out of the immediate presence of the bail. In other words, the arrest must be the act of the person authorized, by means of his assistant; and not the arrest of the assistant, who has no authority further than it is conferred by the presence or active co-operation of the bail or his deputy."

In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Vaughn (1909) — Ky. —, 115 S. W. 217, it appeared that one Layne was out on bail pending the hearing of a charge made against him. Layne failed to appear at the trial. The plaintiff and two others were sureties on the bail bond. They went to the place where Layne was, and arrested him. They boarded the defendant's train with Layne with the object of taking him to the county in which he was prosecuted. While the train was in motion Layne walked to the rear platform of the car and sought to escape. However, the plaintiff and his cosureties struggled with him and prevented his escape. While the parties were thus engaged the defendant's brakemen and conductor stopped the train and ordered them off. According to the plaintiff, after they came off the train, the defendant's employees started the train again, leaving plaintiff and the prisoner on the ground. The conductor testified that he left the parties there because the plaintiff refused to show him his authority to arrest and hold Layne. It was held that if the defendant failed to give the plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to convey his prisoner over the defendant's line the latter was liable in damages to the former.

In some jurisdictions a statute provides for an arrest by the sheriff on a direction of the bail indorsed on a certified copy of the recognizance. See

But where an unauthorized person seeks to arrest the principal, and in the altercation commits a felony, he will be held liable therefor. Coleman v. State (1905) 121 Ga. 594, 49 S. E. 716. In that case it appeared that a person on bail was indicted. Having failed to appear, the bond was declared forfeited. The son of the surety obtained a warrant for his arrest. The warrant was addressed "to any sheriff, deputy sheriff, constable or marshal of this state." The son placed the warrant in the hands of the defendant and another, both private individuals, with instructions to arrest the principal. The defendant attempted to apprehend the principal, and in so doing killed him. It was held that he could not defend himself on the ground that he had a warrant in his possession for the arrest of the deceased. The court said: "Where one accused of crime is released on bond, he is transferred from the custody of the sheriff to the legal but friendly custody of the bail, whose 'dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment;' but they may at will surrender him again to the custody of the law. If the accused refuses to surrender, the bail can seize and hold him in order to make delivery in discharge of the bond. But the surety may be a woman, or a man physically too weak to cope with the accused; or the person charged with the crime may be at a distant point, and out of the reach of his bondsman. For these and other reasons, the bail may lawfully deputize an agent to seize the body and deliver him to the custody of the sheriff. . . . While this is true, a new trial cannot be granted here because of the court's refusal to give the charge requested as to the right to make such arrest by an agent. There was no evidence in the present case to show that the bail had appointed Coleman to recapture Griffin; and nothing to show that he authorized his son, R. E. Collins, to make such arrest, or delegated to him any power to appoint agents for that purpose." And in People v. Moore (1845) 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 1, it was held that where a sheriff obtained a warrant for the arrest of the principal, and he delivered it to a constable with oral instruction to apprehend the principal, the arrest was invalid, as the oral instruction was unauthorized. The court stated that the direction should have been given in writing.

At common law no process was necessary to authorize the arrest of the principal by his bail. Re Siebert (1899) 61 Kan. 112, 58 Pac. 971; State v. Cunningham (1855) 10 La. Ann. 393; Com. v. Brickett (1829) 8 Pick. (Mass.) 138.

In Taylor v. Taintor (1873) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 366, 21 L. ed. 287, the rule was said to rest on the reason that the seizure "is likened to the rearrest by the sheriff of an escaping prisoner."

In the case of Re Siebert (Kan.) supra, the court said: "It is sufficient to say in reply to this that in immemorial legal theory the petitioner never was discharged from custody. The giving of the recognizance by him only operated to transfer the custody of his person from the sheriff to his sureties. Thenceforth, they, instead of the sheriff, were his jailers. Blackstone defines bail as 'a delivery or bailment of a person to his sureties, upon their giving (together with himself) sufficient security for his appearance; he being supposed to continue in their friendly custody, instead of going to jail.' 4 Bl. Com. 297. There was, therefore, no occasion for the issuance and service of a new order of arrest nor for a warrant of commitment. The prisoner having been thus retransferred from the custody of one jailer to another from whom the former had received him, the latter jailer again took him, and thence was authorized to detain him under the original warrant by which he had been arrested. The effect of a surrender of an accused by his bail is to remit him to the same condition he was in before the recognizance was given; he is then held on the original process against him, no new process being necessary to justify his confinement."

In some jurisdictions it is provided by statute that the bail may arrest the principal on a bailpiece or certified copy of the recognizance. In Carr v. Sutton (1912) 70 W. Va. 417, 74 S. E. 239, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 453, such a statute was held to be cumulative, and not to affect the common-law right to arrest without process. But in Gray v. Strickland (1909) 163 Ala. 344, 50 So. 152, a similar statute was held to abrogate the common-law rule, and an arrest without a certified copy of the undertaking was held to constitute false imprisonment. See, to the same effect, Nicholson v. Killpatrick (1914) 188 Ala. 258, 66 So. 8.

Bail have no power to arrest the principal in a foreign country. Reese v. United States (1870) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 13, 19 L. ed. 541. But, as between the states of the American Union, the bail of one held to answer in one state may arrest the principal in another state, and no requisition is necessary. Salles v. Werner (1912) 171 Ill. App. 96; Com. v. Brickett (1829) 8 Pick. (Mass.) 138; Nicolls v. Ingersoll (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 145; State v. Lingerfelt (1891) 109 N. C. 775, 14 L.R.A. 605, 14 S. E. 75. And see dictum in Taylor v. Taintor (1873) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 366, 21 L. ed. 287.

In Nicolls v. Ingersoll (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 145, it was said: "If the principal is to be considered as standing in the situation of a prisoner who has escaped from the arrest of the sheriff, according to the language of one of the cases, can there be any reasonable doubt but a sheriff, in such case, would have a right to pursue and arrest his prisoner, in a neighboring state; and, by parity of reasoning, bail must have the like authority. The cases I have referred to are sufficient to show that the law considers the principal as a prisoner, whose jail liberties are enlarged or circumscribed, at the will of his bail; and, according to this view of the subject, it would seem necessarily to follow that, as between the bail and his principal, the controlling power of the former over the latter may be exercised at all times and in all places; and this appears to me indispensable for the safety and security of bail."

In State v. Lingerfelt (N. C.) supra, the court said: "It is urged by the attorney general that the right, when exercised in another state, may be attended with inconvenience and trouble; but, with the qualifications stated in Republica v. Philadelphia Gaoler (1797) 2 Yeates (Pa.) 263, it is not plainly apparent how any evil may result. Be that as it may, the principle is firmly established by a uniform course of judicial decisions, both state and Federal, and until the legislature sees fit to regulate the manner in which the bail from another state is to exercise his rights, we do not feel at liberty (especially in a case of life and death) to assume the exceptional position that the common-law method, as generally recognized in the United States, does not apply in North Carolina. It is urged, however, that, the recognizance having been forfeited by the default of the principal to appear in the Tennessee court, the right of bail to take his principal was extinguished. It will be observed that the judgment was only conditional, and that a scire facias was ordered to be issued. It has never been understood in this state, nor do we so understand the common law, that such a judgment has the effect contended for. The right of the bail to take his principal in a criminal case before final judgment, and to produce him in court in mitigation of the penalty, is generally recognized in North Carolina, and we have been referred to no authority where the contrary has been held."

In Whitener v. State (1897) 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 146, 41 S. W. 595, it was held that a warrant issued at the instance of a surety desiring to surrender his principal may be executed in any county of the state.

Where a person accused of the commission of a crime in one jurisdiction is at liberty under a bail bond, and is later held in custody by the authorities of another jurisdiction, the surety on the bail bond cannot take him from that custody for the purpose of surrendering him. United States v. French (1812) 1 Gall. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 15,165; Cozart v. Wolf (1916) 185 Ind. 505, 112 N. E. 241. And see CAMPBELL v. RENO COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 178. In United States v. French (Fed.) supra, it was held that the sureties could not obtain the body of the principal on a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of surrendering him, when it appeared that after he was released on bail he was arrested and kept in custody on another charge. In Taylor v. Taintor (1878) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 366, 21 L. ed. 287, it appeared that the principal was arrested in Connecticut and gave bail. He went to New York and was there arrested and taken to Maine on a requisition. It was held that a forfeiture of the bond was proper, the court saying: "They may doubtless permit him to go beyond the limits of the state within which he is to answer, but it is unwise and imprudent to do so; and if any evil ensue, they must bear the burden of the consequences, and cannot cast them upon the obligee."

III. Termination of right to surrender.

The general rule seems to be that bail may surrender the principal, and thereby exonerate themselves, at any time before the entry of final judgment in a proceeding to enforce their liability.

Missouri.—State v. Taylor (1896) 136 Mo. 462, 37 S. W. 1121; State v. Green (1915) 263 Mo. 637, 178 S. W. 678.

New Mexico.—State v. Riley (1916) 21 N. M. 450, 155 Pac. 720.

In Watson v. Bancroft (1849) 4

Strobb. L. (S. C.) 218, it was said: "It is now fully settled that the bail may surrender their principal at any time before the end of the term to which the sci. fa. on the bail bond is returnable. Formerly the surrender was regarded ex gratia or as a favor granted by the court, but is now so indisputably established as to be considered a matter of right. In this case the surrender was made within the time and by the leave of the court. The only question made is whether the court under these circumstances ought to have ordered that all further proceedings on the sci. fa. should be stayed, on the payment of costs which had accrued. The bail stipulate for nothing else but that the principal shall be put back in the possession of the sheriff out of whose custody he has been taken. When this is done, they are discharged from any legal liability, and why should a causeless action be continued, and the bail put to the expense of pleading to and defending themselves against an action manifestly without anything remaining to support it?"

In Smith v. State (1855) 17 Ga. 462, the court said: "We are all, as a court, familiar with the practice which allows a security, upon a recognizance, to discharge himself at any time before final judgment, by surrendering the prisoner and paying the costs of scire facias. We were of the opinion that there was some statute on this subject, but have not been able to find it. The practice may be of common-law origin. At all events, it is a reasonable practice, . . . and a just one, as applicable to this particular case."

The entry of a conditional judgment of forfeiture does not terminate the right of the sureties to surrender the principal. Bearden v. State (1889) 89 Ala. 21, 7 So. 755; State v. Lingerfelt (N. C.) supra.

In Com. v. Johnson (1849) 3 Cush. (Mass.) 454, it was held that the bail of one charged with a crime cannot exonerate themselves by surrendering him after the recognizance has been forfeited of record, the court saying: "It was then manifestly too late for the surety to save his liability by a surrender of the principal. The time for the surrender was past; the record of the forfeiture of the recognizance was made up; and the consequent liability of the surety was fixed. At this stage of the proceedings, there is no provision of law by which the surety, as a matter of right, can discharge himself from liability by a surrender of the principal, though the court may have power to receive a surrender, and to remit the penalty in whole or in part; but that is wholly a matter of discretion, and recognizes no right to make a surrender after a forfeiture."

In SCOTT v. PEOPLE (reported herewith) a decision was rendered in an action against the sureties, but the entry of judgment was stayed for ten days to permit a motion for a new trial. Before the entry of judgment the principal was surrendered. It was held that the sureties were exonerated.

In State v. Anderson (1903) 119 Iowa, 711, 94 N. W. 208, it was said that the right to surrender "becomes perfect the moment the bond is accepted and the defendant discharged from custody, and continues until a forfeiture of the undertaking has been declared or the conditions of the bond have been performed."

In Huston v. People (1898) 12 Colo. App. 271, 55 Pac. 262, a surrender made before the return day of a scire facias on the bond was held to exonerate the sureties.

In Milner v. Petit (1701) 1 Ld. Raym. 720, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1380, the court announced a rule that "if the plaintiff in the original action brings debt against the bail upon their recognizance, the bail shall have eight days after the return of the writ to render the principal; and if there be but four days in the term after the return of the writ, he shall have four days in the following term."

In United States v. Robinson (1907) 85 C. C. A. 520, 158 Fed. 410, it was held that the surrender must be made before the end of the term at which the recognizance is declared to be forfeited.

If the principal is surrendered before the entry of final judgment on the bond, the right of the bail to exoneration is not affected by the fact that during the absence of the principal a witness has left the jurisdiction, so that the prosecuting attorney is compelled to dismiss the prosecution for lack of evidence. State v. Green (1915) 263 Mo. 637, 173 S. W. 673.

In Flemming v. Shockley (1910) 8 Ga. App. 229, 68 S. E. 1013, it was held, in an action by the surety to charge the principal with the expense of making the surrender, that a surety on a bail bond does not have to wait until the bond is finally forfeited before he surrenders his principal.

In Louisiana, by statute, the bail must surrender the principal within five days after the rendition of a judgment of forfeiture on the bail bond, and a surrender after that date does not exonerate him. State v. Farron (1849) 4 La. Ann. 275; State v. Martin (1897) 49 La. Ann. 752, 22 So. 224; State v. Johnson (1913) 132 La. 11, 60 So. 702. In State v. Williams (1885) 37 La. Ann. 200, it was held that a surrender at the term at which the forfeiture was declared exonerated the sureties.

By statute in Kentucky, if the principal is surrendered before the entry of final judgment against the bail the court may, in its discretion, exonerate them. See Com. v. Coleman (1859) 2 Met. (Ky.) 382; Combs v. Com. (1898) 103 Ky. 385, 45 S. W. 359; Com. v. Hillis (1906) 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1063, 96 S. W. 873. In Fortney v. Com. (1910) 140 Ky. 545, 131 S. W. 383, it was said: "The discretion which is conferred upon the court by the section is a judicial discretion, and not an arbitrary one. But its exercise will not be controlled unless palpably abused. Com. v. Davidson (1866) 1 Bush (Ky.) 133; Yarbrough v. Com. (1889) 89 Ky. 151, 25 Am. St. Rep. 524, 12 S. W. 143. Yet the statute must be administered in such a manner as to effectuate its purposes. The purpose of requiring bail bonds is not to enrich the treasury, but to secure the administration of justice. The purpose of the statute in allowing a remission of the whole or a part of the sum specified in the bond, where the defendant is surrendered or arrested before judgment is entered against the bail, is to secure the defendant's being arrested and brought to justice. The bail has this means of protecting himself, and an incentive is offered to him to secure the arrest of the defendant. Thus, justice is not defeated by the criminal's flight, and while the trial may be delayed, the criminal does not escape. The primary object of the law is to punish the criminal. The bond is allowed to be given for the convenience of a person not yet proved to be guilty, and to protect the state against the expense of keeping such persons in jail. When the criminal has been arrested promptly, as in this case, it would entirely defeat the purpose of the statute if no part of the penalty of the bail bond is remitted; for if this may be done, no inducement will be held out to the bail to have the defendant arrested and brought to justice, and it was this that the statute was aimed to secure." In Husbands v. Com. (1911) 143 Ky. 290, 136 S. W. 632, it appeared that the state's attorney had given the principal permission to leave the state. The court allowed six months to the bail within which to find and surrender him, saying: "The circuit court, when it was made to appear that the party had been, in fact, misled by the commonwealth's attorney, and that this was the cause of the accused not appearing, should have given the bail a reasonable opportunity to produce the accused, and his failure to do so, under all the circumstances, was an abuse of discretion."

a. In general.

It has been held that, where a statute prescribes the manner in which the principal in a bail bond shall be surrendered by his sureties, the statutory method must be strictly followed to exonerate the sureties. Edwards v. State (1913) 39 Okla. 605, 136 Pac. 577; Woodring v. State (1908) 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 17, 108 S. W. 371. And see the dictum in Cameron v. Burger (1911) 60 Or. 458, 120 Pac. 10.

In Roberts v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 129, the court, after stating the terms of the statute, said: "These are the modes, and the only ones known to our law. The procedure is fully and explicitly stated in the articles 2741 to 2750, inclusive, and, according to our construction, must be pursued strictly."

In Edwards v. State (Okla.) supra, it was held that where the statute provides for certain record entries a surrender may not be proved by parol.

In United States v. Stevens (1883) 16 Fed. 101, it was held that a compliance with the statute requiring an exoneration to be indorsed on the bond was essential, the court saying: "It is a statutory rule of evidence, declaratory, however, of the general law, and founded in a wise policy, analogous to that of the Statute of Frauds, that the only evidence of the discharge of the sureties in bail shall be the entry by competent authority of the exoneration on the record or the bailpiece, or a copy or them, as the case may be. And it is sufficient reply to the very able argument of counsel for the defendants that the fact of death of the principal, his imprisonment, or other such excuse, may be shown by parol in defense on a proper plea that, as to the defense in this case, the statute imposes another rule, however it may be in those mentioned by counsel. The fact of the surrender may be the essential act, as counsel says, to effectuate the discharge; but the only legal evidence of it, under this statute, is the entry. Again, the answer to the argument that there is no fault of the sureties, but only of the judge or other officer receiving the surrender to make the entry, for which the sureties should not suffer after a surrender, is obvious. The fault is that of the sureties. The officer may be at fault and negligent in failing to perform the ministerial duty of making the entry of the judicial act in ordering the discharge of the sureties; and, possibly, under some circumstances, the officer may be liable to an action for such negligence, if the contributory negligence of the surety himself be no defense. But clearly it is the duty of all parties, or their attorneys, to see to it that, in all cases, the clerk or other ministerial officer shall make the proper entries on the record authorized by the judicial judgment, and it is their fault if they do not give this matter their attention."

In State v. Tieman (1874) 39 Iowa, 474, the statute under consideration provided as follows: "At any time before the forfeiture of their undertaking, the bail may surrender the defendant in their exoneration, or he may surrender himself to the officer to whose custody he was committed at the time of giving bail, in the following manner: 1. A certified copy of the undertaking of bail must be delivered to the officer, who shall detain the defendant in his custody thereon as upon a commitment, and must, by a certificate in writing, acknowledge the surrender. 2. Upon the undertaking and the certificate of the officer, the district court in which the indictment is pending, or was tried, at the next term after the surrender, or, if during term time at the same term, and upon three clear day's notice thereof to the district attorney, with a copy of the undertaking and certificate, may order the bail to be exonerated." Construing that statute, the court said: "The sheriff would have no authority to take or receive the defendant again into his custody, unless delivered to him in the manner pointed out in the statute, or unless delivered to him or placed in his custody in the presence of, and with the knowledge and sanction or by order of, the magistrate, for, the undertaking being duly executed and accepted, the defendant was entitled to freedom from arrest except in a legal manner. In the offer made it was not proposed to show that the magistrate ordered the sheriff to receive Corville into his custody from the surety, or that he had any knowledge whatever that the surety had or intended to surrender him into the custody of the sheriff."

But in State v. Lambert (1898) 44 W. Va. 308, 28 S. E. 930, it was held that the failure of the justice to whom a surrender is made to give a certificate of the fact does not impair the effectiveness of the surrender.

In State v. Mudd (1911) 232 Mo. 564, 134 S. W. 562, it was held that an actual surrender of the principal to the sheriff by the sureties was a sufficient compliance with the statute, although the latter did not, at the time of the surrender, deliver a certified copy of the recognizance to the sheriff, as the statute required.

To constitute a valid surrender the principal must actually be delivered into custody. Thus, an offer to the court to surrender the principal, made when the latter is not in court or in custody, is unavailing. Bonner v. Com. (1905) 27 Ky. L. Rep. 652, 85 S. W. 1196.

In Woodring v. State (1908) 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 17, 108 S. W. 371, the court held that the statute contemplated a manual delivery of the principal by the sureties to the sheriff. In this case it appeared that the sureties told the sheriff that they wished to surrender their principal. The parties made an arrangement to meet at a certain place. The sheriff appeared and so did the principal, but not the sureties. The sheriff informed the principal of his bondsmen's intent and issued to him a new bond with instructions to procure new bondsmen, which the latter never did. It was held that there was no surrender here within the purport of the Texas statute. The court said: "The laws of this state provide but two modes in which bail can effect a surrender of their principal: one mode being by surrendering him into the custody of the sheriff of the county where he is prosecuted; and the other, by making affidavit of a desire to surrender him, and thereby obtaining an order for his arrest. A strict compliance with one or the other of the modes above indicated is necessary to a valid surrender."

So, in State v. Rollins (1875) 52 Ind. 168, it appeared that the principal fled and the bail made no effort to retake him. The sheriff pursued and arrested him and placed him in jail. The bail again went on his bond and then immediately surrendered him. It was held that the surrender prevented a judgment of forfeiture on the first bond. The court said: "It is argued that the above statute was intended to relieve the surety where the principal had run away against his consent, and where he had made an honest effort to secure the return of the principal. We do not think such a construction can be placed upon the statute. It is not so expressed, nor is there anything to show such a legislative intent. The language is broad and express. The bail, at any time before final judgment against him upon a forfeited recognizance, may surrender his principal in open court or to the sheriff, and, upon the payment of costs, shall be discharged. The bail had the right to take out a bailpiece and arrest the principal in any county in the state. Turner v. Wilson (1875) 49 Ind. 581. The state had a right to rearrest the principal. We think it can make no difference how the principal was produced in court. If he was produced by the bail and costs paid before final judgment, the surety was entitled to be discharged."

If the sheriff, at the request of the bail, proceeds to arrest the principal, it constitutes a valid surrender, though he is not bound to undertake the making of the arrest and may require the sureties to bring the principal in. Sternberg v. State (1883) 42 Ark. 127.

Where the principal is arrested on another charge and is in the custody of the officer to whom a surrender should be made, it is sufficient to exonerate the sureties. Huston v. People (1898) 12 Colo. App. 271, 55 Pac. 262, wherein the court said: "Counsel for the people contend, however, that there was no such delivery to the sheriff as is required by the statute. The accused was, on the 14th of December, in the custody of the sheriff in the county jail, the place where the statute said he should be in order to entitle the sureties to be discharged. What more, then, could the sureties do than make a formal surrender? They had no authority to take him out of jail and deliver him back to the sheriff, even if such an idle and useless ceremony should have been necessary." Compare State v. Warwick (1891) 3 Ind. App. 508, 29 N. E. 1142, wherein it was held that the arrest of the principal by the sheriff after the forfeiture of the bond did not release the sureties.

In McKinney v. Com. (1881) 3 Ky. L. Rep. 465, it was held that a delivery to the jailer so as to exonerate the bail must be such as to give the jailer dominion over the accused, and this can ordinarily be done only by putting the accused in the apartment of the jail where prisoners are usually confined. In Com. v. Clark (1886) 7 Ky. L. Rep. 828, it was held that a jailer cannot be required to receive from the surety in a bail bond the surrender of the defendant at any other place than the jail; yet if he does accept such surrender elsewhere the surety will be exonerated. But the jailer being a peace officer, and the surety having the right to command his services as such in arresting the defendant, whether he held the prisoner after the arrest as jailer or as a peace officer is a fact to be settled by the evidence.

In Berkstresser v. Com. (1889) 127 Pa. 15, 17 Atl. 680, a plea reciting that the bail produced the principal in open court and petitioned the court to receive a surrender, on which petition the court refused to act, and that the sheriff was then and there present, was held not to show a surrender to the sheriff.

In People v. Robb (1894) 98 Mich. 397, 57 N. W. 257, the facts and the conclusion of the court were stated as follows: "Levi Lister was acting as deputy sheriff at the time the bail was estreated, and at the time Robb was in court, and sentenced for the offense of keeping a house of ill fame. The defendants offered to show that one of the sureties on the bond requested Louis Hosbein, another deputy sheriff, to take Robb into custody whenever he interposed a plea of not guilty to the charge for which he is recognized in this case, and that this request was communicated to Mr. Lister. The court excluded this testimony. We are cited to no case, nor have we been able to find one, in which it has been held that this is a sufficient surrender. There are cases, it is true, in which it is held that a surrender to the sheriff, accompanied by a certified copy of the recognizance, may be made, but these cases usually depended upon statute. Our statute has made ample provision by § 9488, How. Stat., which provides for the issue of a mittimus, and the delivery of the process, with the body of the principal, to the sheriff. But until there is such delivery, accompanied by process, or the order of some court authorizing the detention of the principal, the sheriff could not justify a detention upon the mere oral direction of the surety, except as the agent of the surety."

In Perkins v. Terrell (1907) 1 Ga. App. 250, 58 S. E. 133, a record recital that the principal was "produced" by the sureties was held not to be sufficient to show that he was "surrendered," the court saying that a surrender "into custody" must appear.

In Du Laurence v. State (1909) 31 Ohio C. C. 418, it was held by a divided court that mere bodily delivery of a principal by a surety in open court is not a sufficient surrender unless accepted by the court.

The fact that the principal attends at the beginning of his trial, no offer to surrender him into custody being made by the bail, is not sufficient. Lee v. State (1875) 51 Miss. 665, wherein the court said: "The record shows that the accused was not surrendered by his sureties, either to the court or to the sheriff. He was present on his trial, but in the custody of his sureties, who, according to the Code and the terms of their undertaking, were his keepers until he was duly surrendered by them, or he was discharged by due course of law. The mere presence of the accused for trial was not a surrender; nor had his arraignment and trial this effect."

A statute of Louisiana (Rev. Stat. § 1033) provides as follows: "Any surety may be relieved from responsibility by making a formal surrender of the defendant or party accused in open court, or within the four walls of the prison of the parish, and not otherwise."

In State v. Miller (1902) 109 La. 27, 33 So. 57, it was held that the manner of surrender provided by the statute must be strictly followed. In that case it appeared that the principal failed to appear when the case was called. A bench warrant was issued against him and given to the parish sheriff. While the sheriff was looking for him one of the sureties learned that he was in New Orleans. The surety went there and found the principal and had him arrested. The sheriff also went to New Orleans, thinking that he might find the principal there, but he did not know that he was there. On his arrival the surety turned over the prisoner to him, and the sheriff placed him in jail. It was held that the surety did not surrender the principal in the manner prescribed by the statute. The court said: "The accused was not surrendered by his surety to the sheriff or his deputy in open court, nor did he surrender him within the four walls of the prison. The surrender, if formally made, took place in the parish of New Orleans. The subsequent placing in jail of the accused was not the act of the surety, but of the sheriff. The statute, after setting out the precise circumstances under which the surety is entitled, by a surrender of the accused, to a discharge, declares that it must be made under those specified circumstances."

In State v. McMichael (1898) 50 La. Ann. 428, 23 So. 992, it appeared that the principal failed to appear at the call of the case. A short time after the term of the court for which the case was marked for trial, the sureties appeared before the sheriff of the parish and stated that "they were prepared to produce the principal." It was held that their bare statement was not such a "formal surrender" as was intended by the statute.

In State v. Martel (1842) 3 Rob. (La.) 22, it appeared that the principal, while the jury were deliberating on his case, forcibly made his escape from the court room. Thereafter a judgment on the bail bond was entered against him and his sureties. The latter contended that the judgment should be set aside because the principal escaped from the custody of the law. But the court held that they were liable, as they had not made a formal surrender of their principal.

In State v. Reames (1914) 136 La. 48, 66 So. 393, it was held that the surrender of the principal to a deputy sheriff at a place 30 miles from the courthouse was not a compliance with the statute. But in State v. Trahan (1879) 31 La. Ann. 715, it appeared that the defendant was indicted for murder, and after a disagreement of the jury in his trial he was released on bail. Pending a second trial he was convicted of another offense and placed in jail. While in jail one of his sureties on the first bail bond told the sheriff that he wished to surrender the defendant. The sheriff said that "it was all right, and that he would cancel the bond." The sheriff then told the principal that his sureties had surrendered him, and later indorsed the bonds as follows: "I hereby certify that Richard Leblanc, one of the bondsmen of Voorhies Trahan on the reverse hereof, has this day surrendered the said V. Trahan to me within the four walls of the jail of the parish. June 11, 1879, G. B. Shaw, Shff." A few days later the defendant escaped from jail. The state's attorney proceeded to have the bond declared forfeited and to obtain a judgment thereon. The sureties contended that they were not liable as they had surrendered their principal, but the trial court gave judgment against them as well as against the principal. On appeal, the judgment as to the former was set aside. The court said: "If bail are not entitled to an exoneration upon such surrender as this, then it would be necessary to hold that they must go through the dumb show of getting the sheriff to lead the prisoner out of his cell only that the bail might instantly lead him back into it, and there deliver him. What we are now holding was foreshadowed in State v. Frith (1839) 14 La. 191, where it was said the bail might have been exonerated by a formal declaration to the sheriff, while the principal was in actual custody, that they wished to surrender him. In this case, not only was the declaration made and taken cognizance of by the sheriff, but he executed a formal release, and the surrender was complete. The surrender was made by one only of the sureties, but a release of one inures to the benefit of all. State v. Doyal (1857) 12 La. Ann. 653. All of them have appealed. It is ordered and decreed that the judgment of the lower court is avoided and reversed, and that there be now judgment in favor of the defendants, sureties, releasing them from their obligation and for their costs in both courts."

In State v. Frith (La.) supra, the defendant gave a bail bond with sureties. Thereafter, and while at large under the bail bond, he was arrested and placed in jail for another crime. The sureties contended that his being in custody exonerated them. But the court held that under the Louisiana statute they were bound to make a formal surrender of their principal. The court said: "The bail are not entitled to an exoneration in this case, because they have made no formal surrender. The principal being confined or imprisoned for an offense not bailable did not prevent a formal surrender, which might have been made. The principal being in the custody of the sheriff, by a formal declaration to that officer that the bail wished to surrender him, and did not consider themselves any longer bound for his appearance, they might have been exonerated."

"It may be laid down as a general rule that the surrender should be made to an officer authorized to admit to bail or to commit to jail." Kellogg v. State (1870) 43 Miss. 57. See to the same effect, People v. Robb (Mich.) supra; State v. Le Cerf (1829) 1 Bail. L. (S. C.) 410.

It seems that at common law a delivery to the sheriff was not authorized. House v. Anniston (1912) 5 Ala. App. 357, 59 So. 686. Statutes in many states, however, provide specifically for a surrender to the sheriff. In Roberts v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 129, under a statute authorizing a surrender "into the custody of the sheriff," the court said: "No officer save the sheriff can receive the accused from the hands of the bail when the surrender is proposed to be made by them of his person. This is an authority which the law has not conferred upon constables or any other officer."

It has been held that where a surrender to the sheriff is authorized the surrender may be made to his deputy. Carter v. State (1884) 43 Ark. 132; Ward v. Colquitt (1879) 62 Ga. 267.

In Carter v. State (Ark.) supra, it appeared that while the principal was out on bail the surety delivered him to a deputy sheriff. The sheriff had been elected to a term of office, and then re-elected, but had not received his commission on the re-election until after the delivery of the principal. It further appeared that the sheriff had not reappointed his deputy at the time of the delivery. Holding, in an action on the bond, that the deputy sheriff had authority to accept the surrender of the principal, the court said: "The receipt for the prisoner was in the sheriff's own name, by deputy, and there is nothing to indicate that he had ever repudiated his former deputy's action. It is most probable that neither the surety nor the deputy knew, at that time, that the sheriff had qualified under his new term on the day before. He had not then received his commission. Everything seemed to have been done regularly, in the utmost good faith, with the intention of complying with the law, and with no appearance of collusion on the part of the surety with the subsequent escape of the prisoner."

But in State v. Le Cerf (1829) 1 Bail. L. (S. C.) 410, it was held that, while a surrender to the sheriff might be valid, a delivery of the principal by his sureties to a deputy sheriff was invalid. And see to the same effect People v. Robb (Mich.) supra, wherein it was said that the surrender must be to an officer who may commit the principal to jail.

Where the surrender is made to an officer not entitled to receive it, as where it is made to the jailer, and not to the court, the officer holds the principal for the sureties. Com. v. Bronson (1853) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 361.

Though the statute provides that a surrender shall be made "to the sheriff," it is a sufficient surrender if the principal is produced in open court, where new bail with other sureties is given. Young v. Deneen (1906) 220 Ill. 350, 77 N. E. 193, affirming (1905) 123 Ill. App. 380.

After the case has been removed by an appeal, a surrender in the court where it originated is ineffectual. House v. Anniston (1912) 5 Ala. App. 357. So, in Stegars v. State (1827) 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 104, it was held that where a recognizance was given before a justice for the appearance of the principal in a superior court, a surrender to the justice was ineffectual. See to the same effect Bird v. Terrell (1907) 128 Ga. 386, 57 S. E. 777.

In Miller v. State (1846) 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 77, it was held that where a recognizance is forfeited in a justice's court, and the record certified to the circuit court, the principal may be surrendered in the latter court.

In Indiana, the surrender may be made in open court or to the sheriff. State v. Rollins (1875) 52 Ind. 168.

In Kentucky, it seems that the proper practice is to surrender the principal in the court at which he is bound to appear, if it is in session (Com. v. Bronson (1853) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 361); and during vacation, to make the surrender to the jailer (Ramey v. Com. (1885) 83 Ky. 534; Schneider v. Com. (1860) 3 Met. (Ky.) 410).

V. Effect of surrender.

A valid surrender of the principal exonerates the bail from all further liability on the bond. SCOTT v. PEOPLE (reported herewith), ante, 176; State ex rel. Smith v. Smith (1917) — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 553; Bruce v. Colgan (1822) 2 Litt. (Ky.) 284; State v. Green (1915) 263 Mo. 637, 173 S. W. 673; State v. Rosseau (1873) 39 Tex. 614; Hughes v. State (1890) 28 Tex. App. 499, 13 S. W. 777. And see the cases cited throughout this note

"The surrender by the sureties places the principal back in the custody of the sheriff, and he holds him by virtue of the original capias under which he arrested him in the first instance, the condition of the prisoner being precisely the same as though he had never been bailed." Patillo v. State (1880) 9 Tex. App. 456.

The exoneration of the sureties by a surrender is not affected by the fact that the principal is thereafter discharged by an unauthorized order of another court, and is never brought to justice. State v. Callahan (1914) 93 Kan. 172, 144 Pac. 189.

In State v. Doyal (1857) 12 La. Ann. 653, it was held that where two of the sureties on a bail bond surrender the principal all of the sureties are exonerated.

In Spooner v. Smith (1910) 134 Ga. 323, 67 S. E. 813, it appeared that the principal procured his release by giving a bail bond with two sureties. On the same day on which he was released, the sureties, fearing that he would run away, took him into custody. One of the sureties carried him to the sheriff and the latter locked him up in jail. Thereafter this surety, without the knowledge of the cosurety, went to the jail and induced a deputy sheriff to release the principal on the strength of the original bond. Later the principal ran away. In an action on the bail bond the sureties contended that the previous surrender to the sheriff exonerated them. Holding against this contention, the court said: "A surety cannot be allowed to procure the release of a prisoner on the basis of a bond signed by him and another, holding it out as a subsisting bond to a deputy sheriff who does not know otherwise, and then repudiate it on the ground that it was inoperative as a bond, because the prisoner had been delivered up to the sheriff after the bond was given, though apparently there was nothing to show any want of vitality in it. To permit this would be to allow the surety to perpetrate a fraud, to hold out a bond as in force, and on that basis secure the advantage derivable from the subsisting bond, and then turn and secure an advantage on the basis that it was not. He is estopped from doing so. If the bond signed by him had sufficient vitality to accomplish the release, it was sufficient to bind the surety who used it for that purpose."

The surrender of the principal and the exoneration of the surety, after a conditional judgment of forfeiture, do not relieve the principal from liability on the forfeited recognizance. Weese v. People (1858) 19 Ill. 643; Lorance v. People (1848) 1 Ind. 359. C. M.

Constitutional law — overcharges for freight — submission of claim to Public Service Commission.

1. A statute requiring a claim to recover overcharge of freight rates to be presented to the Public Service Commission, and limiting the time for such presentation, does not contravene a constitutional provision that property shall be delivered at any station at charges not exceeding those made for similar property to a more distant station in the same direction on the theory that common-law remedies are thereby preserved.

— vested rights — procedure.

2. No litigant has a vested right in procedure so long as his right of action is not abolished.

Common law — what is.

3. The common law is not an inflexible code, but a comprehensive enumeration of principles sufficiently elastic to meet the social development of the people.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover for an overcharge for freight collected by defendant from plaintiff's assignor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George T. Reid, J. W. Quick, and L. B. da Ponte for appellant.

Messrs. Gordon & Easterday and J. E. Belcher for respondent.

Messrs. Higgins & Hughes and Hyman Zettler, amici curiæ.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover for an overcharge, collected by appellant from respondent's assignor, for freight upon sawlogs hauled from Satsop, Washington, to Hoquiam. A greater rate was charged than for a like service given to others between Mack, Washington, and Hoquiam, a greater distance on the same line and in the same direction. The freight was hauled under the published tariffs of the road.

After a demurrer had been filed, the complaint, which alleged no more than the overcharge, was amended, appellant consenting thereto, by adding the following: "All of which shipments were covered by appropriate bills of lading issued by defendant, which bills of lading were alike in form and one of which is hereto attached, marked 'Ex. C,' and made a part hereof."

The demurrer being renewed upon the grounds (1) that the complaint did not state a cause of action, and (2) that the action was not commenced within the time prescribed by law, was overruled upon both grounds. Judgment for want of an answer was entered against appellant.

Appellant relied on Rem. Code, § 8626-91, which provides that where complaints are made to the Public Service Commission concerning overcharges they shall be made within two years: "All complaints concerning overcharges shall be filed with the Commission within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, and the petition for the enforcement of the order shall be filed in the court within one year from the date of the order of the Commission."

And upon Rem. Code, § 165: "An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for shall be commenced within two years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

It is admitted that the cause of action arose more than two years, and less than six years, before the commencement of the action; the position of the appellant being that the Public Service Commission Law affords an exclusive remedy, or, if not, the action is barred under the general Statute of Limitations. Rem. Code, § 165.

We find that the remedy afforded by the statute, while not, in the strict sense of the term, exclusive, is, to the extent that it requires a submission of all controverted questions arising out of freight rates and freight charges, mandatory, and that one aggrieved by an overcharge must first submit his petition to the Public Service Commission within two years after his cause of action has accrued, as a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action, which is in form a common-law action, modified only in so far as the statute touches the measure of recovery and the time within which the action may be brought.

The pertinent sections of the Act of 1911, which is known as the "Public Service Commission Law," Laws 1911, chap. 117, p. 538, are as follows:

"Section 22. No common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of persons or of a like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance . . ." Rem. Code, § 8626-22.

"Section 80. Complaint may be made by the Commission of its own motion, or by any person or corporation, . . . by petition or complaint in writing, setting forth any act or thing done or omitted to be done by any public service corporation in violation, or claimed to be in violation, of any provision of law or of any order or rule of the Commission: . . .

"Upon the filing of a complaint, the Commission shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon the person or corporation complained of, which shall be accompanied by a notice fixing the time when and place where a hearing will be had upon such complaint. The time fixed for such hearing shall not be less than ten days after the date of the service of such notice and complaint, excepting as herein provided." Id. § 8626-80.

Section 81 provides for a hearing and "at the conclusion of such hearing the Commission shall make and render findings concerning the subject-matter and facts inquired into and enter its order based thereon. . . . A full and complete record of all proceedings had before the Commission, or any member thereof, on any formal hearing had, and all testimony shall be taken down by a stenographer appointed by the Commission, and the parties shall be entitled to be heard in person or by attorney. In case of an action to review any order of the Commission, a transcript of such testimony, together with all exhibits introduced, and of the record and proceedings in the cause, shall constitute the record of the Commission." Id. § 8626-81.

"Section 91. When complaint has been made to the Commission concerning the reasonableness of any rate, fare, toll, rental, or charge for any service performed by any public service company, and the same has been investigated by the Commission, and the Commission shall determine that the public service company has charged an excessive or exorbitant amount for such service, the Commission may order that the public service company pay to the complainant the amount of the overcharge so found, with interest from the date of collection.

"If the public service company does not comply with the order for the payment of the overcharge within the time limited in such order, suit may be instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction to recover the same, and in such suit the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. If the complainant shall prevail in such action, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed and collected as part of the costs of the suit. All complaints concerning overcharges shall be filed with the Commission within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, and the petition for the enforcement of the order shall be filed in the court within one year from the date of the order of the Commission." Id. § 8626-91.

And §§ 104 and 111 (Rem. Code, §§ 8626-104, 8626-111), to which we shall hereafter refer.

The right to recover for discriminations in freight rates had not always been acknowledged by the courts. To save any controversy over the question of the right of a shipper who had suffered an extortion in the way of an unequal charge, or who had paid a greater charge for a short haul than had been charged another for a long haul, the people put in the Constitution a declaration prohibiting the practice.

"Persons and property transported over any railroad . . . shall be delivered at any station . . . at charges not exceeding the charges for the transportation of persons and property of the same class, in the same direction, to any more distant station. . . ." Const. art. 12, § 15.

Respondent insists that this section reaffirms the common law. Its argument logically assumes that it is beyond the power of the legislature to take from a shipper any of the remedies incident to the common law, and that it can assert its right to recover in an action upon the bill of lading which is a contract bringing the limitation for such actions within Rem. Code, § 157, which provides for a limitation of six years on "(2) an action upon a contract in writing, or liability express or implied arising out of a written agreement." But we think that such conclusion does not follow.

To avoid unjust discrimination, unlawful rebates, and favoritism theretofore prevailing, the several states, as well as the Congress of the United States, have adopted regulatory statutes. In State ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 52 Wash. 17, 100 Pac. 179, the then Commission Law was attacked because it had provided a procedure then unknown to the law and procedure prevailing in the courts and quasi judicial tribunals of the country. In passing upon the objection, it was said: "It is true that the forms of law and procedure under which this Commission is acting are not in all respects like the forms and procedure governing other courts; and in the language of many of the cases cited by the counsel for appellant, and repeated by the appellants themselves in their arguments, in some respects 'it is not a proceeding under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages.' But it occurs to us that it makes no difference whether it is a proceeding under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages, or whether it is under the powers and proceedings provided by this age. Law is a progressive science, and must necessarily regard the changing conditions of society and of the business of the country, and the legislature and courts of to-day ought certainly to be as well qualified to provide machinery for the guidance of a commission as was the lawmaking power two hundred years ago. The essential idea does not take cognizance of the antiquity of the powers and machinery under which the Commission is acting, but of the question whether, under such powers and the working of such machinery, the respective legal rights of the carriers and the people are preserved. A careful examination of the whole act, we think, refutes the statements made by the attorneys for appellant that the law is cunningly devised for the purpose of preventing railroads from obtaining just judgments, and repels the presumption that the Commission provided for by the legislature is appointed for the purpose of oppressing railroad companies. We think, on the contrary, the presumption must be that the Commission will act with fairness towards all parties."

No better statement of the spirit, purpose, and object of such laws has ever been written.

We may grant that the Constitution declares the common law, but it does not follow that the legislature may not occupy its acknowledged field and define procedures and fix limitations upon the assertion of the right preserved. The "Public Service Commission Law" does not assume to take away the common-law right of action. The legislature has accepted the declaration of the Constitution at its full worth, and has, by a complete statute, endeavored to avoid all of the annoyances and collateral questions attending the assertion of the common-law remedy, such as the reasonableness of the rate in and of itself, and its reasonableness when compared to another rate, the character and extent of service, and attending circumstances, and the measure of recovery, which, it is said, was never defined at common law (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. International Coal Min. Co. 230 U. S. 184, 57 L. ed. 1446, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 893, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 315), and which, it is said with equal gravity, was as certain as a recovery can be upon an implied contract to pay money (Sullivan v. Minneapolis & R. R. Co. 121 Minn. 488, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 612, 142 N. W. 3).

To define procedure, to make a condition precedent, and to fix a limitation does not destroy the force of the Constitution. On the contrary, a law so providing makes it efficient, certain, and uniform in its operation. The substantive right remains; that is all the citizen can insist upon, for it is held under authority without limit that no litigant has a vested right in procedure so long as his right of action is not abolished.

Constitutional law—vested
procedure.

In the Minnesota case, supra, the court held that the Public Service Commission Law of that state was not exclusive, and that the common-law right as well as common-law remedies were not repealed by it. The court reminded itself of the rule as laid down by Chief Justice White in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. 204 U. S. 426, 437, 51 L. ed. 553, 557, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350, 9 Ann. Cas. 1075: "We concede that we must be guided by the principle that repeals by implication are not favored, and, indeed, that a statute will not be construed as taking away a common-law right existing at the date of its enactment, unless that result is imperatively required; that is to say, unless it be found that the pre-existing right is so repugnant to the statute that the survival of such right would in effect deprive the subsequent statute of its efficacy; in other words, render its provisions nugatory"—and proceeded to hold that, whereas the act did not provide a civil remedy, the shipper might pursue his common-law remedy independent of the statute. But here the procedure is not repugnant to, but is in aid of, the common-law right. The statute exempts itself from the rule of the Minnesota case by providing in terms, "If the public service company does not comply with the order for the payment of the overcharge within the time limited in such order, suit may be instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction to recover the same. . . ." Laws 1911, chap. 117, p. 600, § 91 (Rem. Code, § 8626-91).

To say that it is beyond the power of the legislature to provide for an inquiry by a board skilled in the technical science of freight and passenger rates as a prerequisite to the institution of a suit, and within a definite time, would be to assert the indefensible principle that the legislature could not pass any law of procedure where a right of action existed at common law.

That the legislature intended to save all substantive rights is made plain by the act itself. Section 104 provides: "This act shall not have the effect to release or waive any right of action by the state or any person for any right, penalty or forfeiture which may have arisen or may hereafter arise under any law of this state; . . ." Rem. Code, § 8626-104.

And § 111 evidences the legislative intent that all actions brought after the passage of the act should be governed by the terms of the act in so far as it defined procedure. Section 111 (id. § 8626-111) saves only pending actions, while § 104 saves all substantive rights then accrued or thereafter to accrue.

The object of the law was to fix a certain procedure applicable to all cases and to avoid the confusion that would follow a holding for appellant, that is, two limitations upon one cause of action,—a limitation of two years and one thereafter, if a petition were filed with the Commission, and one of six years if respondent's theory be accepted.

Not much has been said by the court upon the subject of freight rates and common-law remedies, but all that has been said is consistent with the principle now asserted. State ex rel. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Railroad Commission, supra; State ex rel. Goss v. Metaline Falls Light & Water Co. 80 Wash. 652, 141 Pac. 1142. Goss and wife petitioned the court for a writ of mandamus to compel a public service corporation to furnish their place of business with water at a rate alleged to be the customary rate of like service to others. A demurrer was interposed and sustained upon the ground that the Public Service Commission had exclusive jurisdiction to entertain the petition in the first instance. The ruling of the court was sustained. That to so provide by statute was not considered by the court as a denial of remedy, for it said: "A careful examination of this act will disclose a legislative intention to invest the Public Service Commission with exclusive original jurisdiction to hear, pass upon, and determine the questions here presented. The Public Service Commission, as constituted, is authorized to examine in the first instance and pass upon these problems. Appellants should seek their remedy before that tribunal."

The case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Carstens Packing Co. 92 Wash. 243, 158 Pac. 721, is relied on. That case arose under a rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon a subject resting in rule and regulation as distinguished from right and remedy, and throws no light upon the present controversy.

Respondent contends that the court has held in Lilly Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 64 Wash. 589, 117 Pac. 401, that the court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit independent of the statute. That case is readily distinguished and, when properly understood, does not impinge any of our present conclusions. The court there dealt with the rights of the parties as they were defined by the Interstate Commerce Law. The jurisdiction of the courts to entertain a suit to recover illegal discriminations in freight rates without first resorting to the Interstate Commerce Commission was sustained upon, and by reference to, the 22d section of the Act to Regulate Commerce. "Nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies." 24 Stat. at L. 387, chap. 104, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8595.

The Act to Regulate Commerce preserves existing rights and remedies; the Public Service Commission Law preserves rights, but not remedies, except as to cases then pending. Laws 1911, chap. 117, pp. 609, 611, §§ 104, 111 (Rem. Code, §§ 8626-104, 8626-111).

If the common law be the growth of the ages, it follows that it must grow with the ages. The common law is not an inflexible code, but a comprehensive enumeration of principles sufficiently elastic to meet the social development of the people. It is in a state of "constant improvement and development, in keeping with advancing civilization and new conditions of society." Holmes, Common Law, pp. 1-5, 36 et seq.

Common law—
what is.

It was the boast of the common law that it afforded a remedy for every wrong. Its remedies were not always adequate. Sometimes, because of changing conditions, they become burdensome. This was the evident condition when the problems of transportation first engaged the attention of the courts. To repeat, the people wisely asserted the common-law right to compel fairness of freight charges in their Constitution, and left it to the legislature to define a procedure that would, while preserving the right, make recovery certain in amount, and tend to reduce the volume of litigation. In so doing, it worked no hardship on anyone by making provision that a claim should be filed with the Commission and within a certain time, it being nowhere asserted that the time limited is unreasonable.

Constitutional law—overcharges for freight—submission of claim to Public Service Commission.

The claim for the overcharge was not made by respondent's assignor within the time fixed by law. The condition precedent to the right to sue is nonexistent. The complaint does not state a cause of action.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of statute requiring claims for refund of overcharges by carriers to be submitted to Public Service Commission.

A statute making it a condition precedent of any remedy by an aggrieved shipper against a carrier that he complain to the Railroad Commission, and have its determination of whether the rate complained of is excessive, was held to provide an exclusive remedy in Frank A. Graham Ice Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1913) 153 Wis. 145, 140 N. W. 1097, and not to be unconstitutional as the denial of the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the state and Federal Constitutions. The court states that no one has a vested right in the continuance of the common-law remedy to redress future wrongs, and it is further stated that the legislature, in the statute involved, preserved a remedy by action against the Railroad Commission in favor of any aggrieved party, so that the rights of all parties are well guarded under the law.

be filed with the Railroad Commission, and providing for a special procedure upon the award in the circuit court in case the carrier should fail to satisfy the same, was sustained in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Paducah Brewery Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 357, 163 S. W. 239. The statute provided for an investigation by the Railroad Commission of overcharges, in which investigation an award shall be made according to the judgment of the Commission, which, if not paid, shall be filed in the circuit court of the county, and summons issued against the carrier. This was held not violative of a constitutional provision that the general assembly shall not pass local or special acts concerning the jurisdiction, or the practice, or the circuits of the courts of justice; or the rights, powers, duties, or compensation of the officers thereof; but practice in the courts of continuous session may be made different from practice in circuit courts held in terms. The specific objections which were made by the railroad company to the statute in question were (1) that, upon the award being filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, he was required to issue a summons without the filing of his petition as in other actions; (2) because of the restriction contained in the statute as to the introduction of evidence in the circuit court; and (3) because it conferred upon the circuit court exclusive jurisdiction of actions upon awards of the Commission, irrespective of the amount in controversy. The court states that the purpose of the constitutional provision in question was to insure the uniformity of jurisdiction and practice in the circuit courts, and under the statute the proceedings upon an award of the Commission would be the same in one circuit court as in another, and that this does not constitute special legislation within the purview of the constitutional limitation.

The constitutionality of the Kentucky act was again sustained in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Greenbrier Distillery Co. (1916) 170 Ky. 775, P.U.R.1916F, 508, 187 S. W. 296, and held not to violate § 59, subsection 1, of the Kentucky Constitution by allowing an award of the Railroad Commission to be proceeded upon and a judgment rendered thereon without the complainant filing a petition and setting forth his cause of action, as is ordinarily required to be done. The Kentucky act was further sustained in the case, over the objection that under it the Railroad Commission was vested with judicial powers contrary to constitutional provision dividing the powers of government into three distinct departments, namely, legislative, executive, and judicial, and providing also for a separation of these departments and vesting the judicial power in the senate when sitting as a court of impeachment, and in one supreme court and the courts established by the Constitution, and providing further that no court except those provided for in the Constitution should be established.

The validity of the Kentucky statute was sustained also by the United States Supreme Court, which held that the procedure thereunder for recovery before the state Railroad Commission, of reparation for payment previously made to a carrier for transportation in excess of the rate found by such Commission to be reasonable, could not be said to deny the due process of law guaranteed by the United States Constitution on the theory that there was no formal issue and no method of requiring the production of evidence; that the pleadings were sufficiently formal, and the carrier was permitted to raise such issues and introduce such evidence as it desired; and that there was nothing to show that it suffered for lack of compulsory process against witnesses. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Finn (1915) 235 U. S. 601, 59 L. ed. 379, P.U.R.1915A, 121, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 146. It was further held by the United States Supreme Court that a carrier could not object on constitutional grounds to the procedure under the Kentucky statute for the recovery and reparation for payment previously made to it for transportation in excess of the rates found by the Railroad Commission to be reasonable, because, on the subsequent trial in the court to enforce the Commission's reparation order, there was no right to adduce evidence other than such as was presented to the Commission, unless the court should first be satisfied that the evidence was such as could not have been produced before the Commission with the exercise of reasonable diligence, where there was nothing to show that such a carrier had or could have had any defense to the payment of reparation, that it had not already either interposed or waived in the proceedings before the Commission, or to show that it had any evidence to be adduced before the court that it would be prevented from introducing by the effect of the restriction.

A statute providing that a shipper may invoke his remedy by application to the board of railroad commissioners or by an action of court, but may not pursue both remedies at the same time, and providing that if the action is brought before the Commission the Commission may order reparation, and providing further for the enforcement of its order in the circuit court, was sustained in Turner Creamery Co. v.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1915) 36 S. D. 310, P.U.R.1916A, 1083, 154 N. W. 819. The objections that were raised to the statute in this case were that it violated due process of law (a) because § 8, chapter 312, Laws 1913, makes the order of the board absolute unless appealed from; (b) because, upon appeal to the circuit court, the trial must be had solely upon the record made before the board; (c) because, upon appeal to the circuit court, no trial by jury is provided for. In answering the first point, the court states that in view of the fact that the statute provides for the enforcement of the order of the Commission in another action, there is no reason for the assertion that due process of law has been violated by the statute making the order absolute unless appealed from. The statute was held not to be unconstitutional because of the second reason, and the third reason was held to be obviated by an amending statute, which provided for a trial by jury in the circuit court in cases in which the order of the board required the payment of money.

GLOBE & RUTGERS FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY of the State of New York, Appt.

Oregon Supreme Court (In Banc) — September 17, 1918.

(— Or. —, 174 Pac. 1161.)

Insurance — denial of liability — effect on estoppel.

1. The denial of liability by an insurer who has promised to pay a loss relieves whatever estoppel may exist because of the promise to plead the time limitation provided in the policy, so that the action must be brought within a reasonable time thereafter.

— adjustment — finding of amount.

2. The finding by an insurance adjuster that the amount of the loss exceeded the face of the policy, upon visiting with the owner the insured property, which has been destroyed by fire, is an adjustment of the loss.

— time limitation — validity.

3. A provision of an insurance policy, limiting the time for bringing action to recover for a loss to twelve months after the loss, is valid.

— unreasonable delay.

4. A delay by an insured for more than two and a half years in bringing an action on a policy limiting the time for action to one year after loss, after the insurer has repudiated its promise to pay the loss, is unreasonable and bars action on the policy.

— garnishment — waiver of time limit.

5. That an insurer has been garnished for a claim against the insured, and for that reason refuses to pay the policy to the insured, does not amount to a waiver of the time limited in the policy for bringing the action.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1423.]

On Petition for Rehearing.

Definition — waiver — estoppel.

6. The distinction between waiver and estoppel is that a waiver is a voluntary relinquishment of a known right, while an estoppel consists of a preclusion which in law prevents one from alleging or denying a fact in consequence of his own previous act, averment, or denial.

7. One who relinquishes a known right given him by contract cannot, without consent of his adversary, reclaim it.

Estoppel — lifting ban — notice.

8. The ban of an estoppel may be lifted by the one against whom it is invoked, by the giving of proper notice.

— denial of liability on insurance policy.

9. The ban of an estoppel upon an insurer to deny liability on a policy, because of the assurance of its agent that the claim would be paid, is lifted by notifying the insured that the claim will not be paid, so that the insured can no longer rely on it to prevent the running of the limitation period.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Johns, J.:

On June 14, 1912, for value, the defendant executed to plaintiff its certain standard fire insurance policy for $1,200 on a beach cottage in Gearhart park. On October 2, 1912, while the policy was in force, the property was totally destroyed by fire. The defendant was promptly notified of the loss, and about October 16, 1912, the plaintiff, with T. C. Shankland, as the adjuster of the defendant, and at his request, made a trip to Gearhart for the purpose of adjusting the loss. Shankland fixed the amount of the loss at $1,531, and thereafter they returned together to Portland. The claim was never paid, and outside of some personal interviews with the agent of the company, and the writing of some letters to the home office, insisting upon payment, nothing further was done by the plaintiff prior to the commencement of this action. Pending the adjustment of the loss, the representative of the Astoria Box & Lumber Company had a conference with Shankland, after which that company commenced an action against the plaintiff upon an alleged claim of about $500, sued out a writ of attachment, and caused a garnishee process to be served upon the defendant to secure the claim.

Plaintiff commenced this action on June 20, 1916. The policy provides that in the event of loss the insured, "within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by the company, shall render a statement to the company, signed and sworn to by said insured," as to certain matters and things therein required. It also provides: "No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after the full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire."

In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that he kept and performed all of the terms and conditions of the policy by him to be kept and performed; that after the garnishee process was served he demanded of defendant that it pay the amount of the policy; that "said demand was repeatedly made, and said defendant herein represented that said payment would be made, and said loss fully adjusted and settled, as soon as said pretended garnishment proceedings had been determined and disposed of;" that "said representations and promises on the part of defendant in reference to said settlement of said loss were continued until after one year had elapsed from the date of said fire as herein set forth and alleged, and then and after that date said company refused to make settlement of said loss or any part of said $1,200 absolutely;" that such representations and promises were made to deceive the plaintiff, and that by reason thereof he did not commence his action "upon said policy within the time limit therein, to wit, one year, and said plaintiff believed said representations to be true, and, relying thereon, was induced thereby not to bring said action within said time aforesaid;" that such representations were false and fraudulent and were made without any purpose or intent of complying therewith and to deceive and mislead the plaintiff; that he relied thereon, "and on account of said representations and said conduct defendant ought not now to be permitted to say that this action was not commenced within the time limited by said policy."

To the complaint the defendant filed an amended answer, denying any and all of its material allegations, except as to the issuance of the policy, and among other grounds of defense, and for a further and separate answer, alleged that the "proof of loss" was not made within sixty days after the fire, as provided for in the policy, and that the action was not commenced within the time specified by the terms of the policy. To this answer the plaintiff filed a further and separate reply, in which he alleged facts tending to show that the defendant was estopped to claim that "proof of loss" was not made within sixty days, or to plead the time limitation in the policy, for the reasons that "said representations and promises on the part of defendant in reference to said settlement of said loss were continued until after one year had elapsed from the date of said fire, as set forth and alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and then, and not until then, said company refused to make settlement for said loss or any part thereof." A trial was had, and the jury returned a verdict for the full amount of the policy, upon which judgment was entered, and from which this appeal is taken.

Messrs. Veazie, McCourt, & Veazie for appellant.

Messrs. W. C. Winslow and Carey F. Martin for respondent.

Johns, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have twice carefully read the record. The plaintiff met the adjuster of the defendant at the scene of the fire, for the purpose of investigating and adjusting the amount of the loss, in going to and from which place he traveled 250 miles. It is very apparent from the record that the sole and only object of the plaintiff in meeting the adjuster at Gearhart was to ascertain and determine the amount of the loss, with a view of making the necessary proofs; otherwise, he would not have gone to the expense and trouble of making the trip. The policy was for $1,200. The adjuster found that the loss was $1,531; hence, the amount of the loss was adjusted.

adjustment—finding of amount.

It is maintained that the plaintiff did not make any actual "proof of loss," as required by the terms and conditions of the policy. There is no evidence that the plaintiff ever requested, or that the defendant ever furnished him, any blanks for his "proof of loss." Fair dealing and business courtesy required that the defendant should aid and assist, rather than mislead and deceive, him in the making of his "proof of loss," and it is very clear that the adjuster, Shankland, was far more interested in having the garnishee process of the Astoria Box & Lumber Company served on the defendant than he was in aiding and assisting the plaintiff; otherwise there never would have been any question about such proof.

But, under the view that we have taken of this case, all such considerations become immaterial. The testimony shows that the plaintiff read over and knew the terms and conditions of the policy at the time of its receipt, and it expressly provides that any action must be brought "within twelve months next after the fire." The fire occurred on October 2, 1912. This action was commenced on June 29, 1916. The authorities are uniform in holding that a time limitation in which such an action shall be brought is valid, if the time is reasonable, and that a twelve months' limitation is reasonable.

The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that one year after the fire the defendant "then refused to make said settlement for said loss, or any part of said sum of $1,200 absolutely," and that, "relying upon the alleged promises and by reason thereof, he did not bring his action within the twelve months; that the defendant ought not now to be permitted to say that this action was not commenced within the time limited by said policy." In substance, he makes the same allegations in his reply, and as a witness he testifies to a conversation with the adjuster, Shankland, in the fall of 1913, in which the adjuster told him that he did not have any right to bring action, that he had lost his right if he ever had one, and also that up to the time of that conversation with Shankland in Portland in October, 1913, he relied upon the promises of the defendant that the policy would be paid when the garnishment proceedings were adjusted. Hence, the plaintiff alleges in both his complaint and reply, and as a witness testifies, that at or about the time the year expired he knew and was advised by the company that it denied all liability and would contest his claim, yet he did not commence his action until at least two years and eight months after he received that information. In the face of such allegations and proof, we are of the opinion that when he acquired such knowledge he could not thereafter rely, and did not rely, upon such alleged promises or representations of the company. The plaintiff has not shown or alleged any excuse or reason for not bringing his action within a reasonable time after he received the information, on or about October 2, 1913, that his claim would be contested, or why he delayed bringing his action until June 29, 1916.

Assuming that the defendant was estopped to plead the time limitation, the estoppel was removed when the plaintiff was notified that the defendant denied liability and would contest his claim, and upon receipt of such notice the plaintiff then had a reasonable time within which to commence his action. David v. Oakland Home Ins. Co. 11 Wash. 181, 39 Pac. 443; Phillips v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. (C. C.) 101 Fed. 33. The action was commenced on June 29, 1916, and under the facts disclosed by the record we hold as a matter of law that it was not commenced within a reasonable time after the defendant notified the plaintiff that it would contest his claim and deny liability, and for such reason the court should have directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. This decision is founded upon a contract, and is not in conflict with, and is to be distinguished from, the opinion of Mr. Justice Benson in the case of Hood v. Seachrest, 89 Or. 457, 174 Pac. 734, rendered September 10, 1918, which was founded upon the statute.

It is also shown by the record that the garnishee process was still pending at the time the action herein was commenced, and under the authority of Ripley v. Aetna Ins. Co. 30

It is also shown by the record that the garnishee process was still pending at the time the action herein was commenced, and under the authority of Ripley v. Aetna Ins. Co. 30

(— Or. —, 174 Pac. 1161.)

N. Y. 136, 86 Am. Dec. 362, the fact that the defendant had been garnished, and that by reason thereof <sup>—garnishment—</sup> it would not settle <sup>waiver of</sup> the loss while that <sup>time limit.</sup> process was pending, did not amount to a waiver of the time limitation in the policy, and the defendant would not be estopped.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the action is dismissed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Benson, J., on February 11, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion (— Or. —, 178 Pac. 358):

The petition for rehearing in this case very earnestly attacks the conclusion in the original opinion herein, which is expressed in these words: "Assuming that the defendant was estopped to plead the time limitation, the estoppel was removed when the plaintiff was notified that the defendant denied liability and would contest his claim, and upon receipt of such notice the plaintiff then had a reasonable time within which to commence his action."

The opinion concludes that, since more than two years had elapsed thereafter before the action was commenced, plaintiff's right was barred. The question suggested by the opinion and the arguments upon the petition for rehearing did not assume a prominent position in the former hearing, and therefore we have since made a very careful investigation of the authorities which have at this time been cited by counsel.

Plaintiff argues that when a defendant has, by his own conduct, waived any of the requirements of a contract, that condition or limitation is out of the contract for all time, and cannot be revived. He also urges, as a sequence, that when the period of the limitation fixed by the contract has been eliminated by the conduct of the defendant there remains no limit other than the general Statute of Limitations, under which this action is not barred. In considering the authorities in support of this view, we may well keep in mind the somewhat elusive distinction between waiver and estoppel as illustrated in Kimball v. Horticultural Fire Relief, 79 Or. 133, 154 Pac. 578, a distinction which appears to be that a "waiver" is <sup>Definition—</sup> a voluntary relin- <sup>waiver—</sup> quishment of a known right, while <sup>estoppel.</sup> an "estoppel" consists of a preclusion which in law prevents a party from alleging or denying a fact in consequence of his own previous act, averement, or denial. Hence, if a party relinquishes a known right, awarded him by contract, he cannot, without the consent of his adversary, reclaim it. But the ban of an estoppel may be lifted by the <sup>Waiver—effect.</sup> party against whom <sup>Estoppel—</sup> it is invoked, by the <sup>lifting ban—</sup> giving of proper notice. In the case at bar, we may assume that the defendant, by the conduct of its agents, led the plaintiff to believe that his claim would not be contested, but would eventually be paid. So long as it maintained this attitude, the plaintiff was warranted in remaining quiescent; but when defendant notified him that the policy claim would not be <sup>—denial of</sup> paid the ban of the <sup>liability on</sup> estoppel was raised, <sup>insurance</sup> and the plaintiff <sup>policy.</sup> could no longer plead that he was being deceived by the tactics of the adversary.

With these principles in mind, let us examine the authorities cited by the appellant. The leading case relied upon is that of Semmes v. Hartford Ins. Co. (Semmes v. City F. Ins. Co.) 13 Wall. 158, 20 L. ed. 490, in which the circumstances were of a sort which could occur only once in many generations. The plaintiff was a resident and citizen of Mississippi, and the defendant a corporation of Connecticut. The loss occurred in January, 1860, and the action was begun on October 31, 1866. The defendant relied upon a provision in the policy to the effect: "No suit for the recovery of any claim upon the same should be sustainable in any court unless such suit should be commenced within the term of twelve months next after any loss or damage should occur; and that in case any such suit should be commenced after the expiration of twelve months next after such loss or damage should have occurred, the lapse of time should be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim thereby so attempted to be enforced."

To this plea there was a replication of the diverse citizenship of the parties, and that the Civil War had prevented the prosecution of the suit within the time limited in the contract. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court, and apparently bases his reasoning and conclusion upon the second clause of the time limitation, as above set out, using this language:

"Now, this contract relates to the twelve months next succeeding . . . the loss, and the court has no right, as in the case of a statute, to construe it into a number of days equal to twelve months, to be made up of the days in a period of five years in which the plaintiff could lawfully have commenced his suit.

"So, also, if the plaintiff shows any reason which in law rebuts the presumption, which, on the failure to sue within twelve months, is, by the contract, made conclusive against the validity of the claim, that presumption is not revived again by the contract. It would seem that, when once rebutted fully, nothing but a presumption of law or presumption of fact could again revive it. . . . And though the plaintiff may show by his disability to sue a sufficient answer to the twelve months provided by the contract, he must still bring his suit within the reasonable time fixed by the legislative authority; that is, by the Statute of Limitations."

It will be at once observed that this case is widely different from the one at bar, in that there is no element in it, either of waiver or of estoppel. The failure to bring the action within the contract time was not attributable to either plaintiff or defendant, but to the unforeseen tragedy of civil war. This difference is emphasized by the fact that Mr. Justice Miller bases his conclusion upon that clause of the policy which makes the failure to sue within twelve months conclusive evidence of the invalidity of the claim, a clause which is not found in the policy which we are considering.

The next case which we are asked to consider is Illinois Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Baker, 153 Ill. 240, 38 N. E. 627. This case holds that hopes of payment held out to a plaintiff by an insurance company as an inducement not to sue within the time limited in the policy operate as a waiver of the limitation clause in the policy; that such waiver cannot be revoked, and that after such waiver the case rests upon the statutory limitation.

Next we have the case of Galloway v. Standard F. Ins. Co. 45 W. Va. 237, 31 S. E. 969, from which we quote: "Now, whether such promise continuing unexecuted for a time, and then ended by a refusal to perform it, leaving a part of the period reasonably sufficient for suit, would be a waiver of the clause, or merely suspend it from the promise to the refusal to fulfil it, I need not, do not, say. I do say, however, that where such promise stands for the whole period of the limitation, it is not a mere suspension, but a waiver of the clause of limitation."

The opinion cites with approval Semmes v. Hartford Ins. Co., and Illinois Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Baker, supra, and holds that the general Statute of Limitations controls.

Finally, our attention is directed to Earnshaw v. Sun Mut. Aid Soc. 68 Md. 465, 6 Am. St. Rep. 460, 12 Atl. 884. This case resembles that of Semmes v. Hartford Ins. Co. supra, in that there is no element of either waiver or estoppel; the delay in bringing the action having been accomplished by the act of a third party, who commenced a suit to restrain the defendant from paying the money to plaintiffs, and secured a temporary restraining order which continued in force until the contract time limitation had expired. The opinion simply follows Semmes v. Hartford Ins. Co. supra, and bases its conclusion upon that authority.

Opposed to these, there is a strong line of authorities which hold to the view that such acts of the defendant as are indicated in the present case do not, in the strict sense, constitute a waiver, but a simple case of estoppel, the effect of which is to suspend the time limitation of the contract until the hour when the estoppel is removed by notice to the plaintiff that his claim is repudiated, at which moment the contract limitation again becomes effective, and gives the plaintiff twelve months from that date in which to begin his action. Among the authorities supporting this doctrine, we note 1 Wood on Limitations, § 49, which says: "If the insurer adjusts the loss, and promises to pay it within a specified time, the period covered by the promise is excluded from the limitation."

Joyce on Insurance, § 8207, says: "A provision requiring suit to be brought within a certain time may be waived, and this waiver may be inferred from acts and conduct on the part of the insurer. And if the insured is induced by the acts of the officers or agents of the insurer to suspend for a certain time the performance of acts required on his part after loss, such time should be added to the time limited for bringing action."

The following cases support the doctrine thus formulated: Killips v. Putnam F. Ins. Co. 28 Wis. 472, 9 Am. Rep. 506; Black v. Winnieshiek Ins. Co. 31 Wis. 74; Kentucky Mut. Security Fund Co. v. Turner, 89 Ky. 665, 13 S. W. 104; Steel v. Phenix Ins. Co. 2 C. C. A. 463, 7 U. S. App. 325, 51 Fed. 715; Allemania F. Ins. Co. v. Peck, 33 Ill. App. 548; Fey

v. I. O. O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 120 Wis. 358, 98 N. W. 206; Voorheis v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. 91 Mich. 469, 51 N. W. 1109. These authorities appear to us to be founded upon the better reasoning, and we therefore conclude that, plaintiff having failed to commence his action within twelve months after being notified that defendant repudiated his claim, the action is barred, and the petition for a rehearing must be denied.

McBride, Ch. J., and Harris and Bean, JJ., concur.

Johns, J., concurs in the result, adhering to the former opinion.

Burnett, J., concurring:

This is an action to recover the amount of a policy of the standard form prescribed by the statutes of this state, insuring a dwelling house owned by the plaintiff, for one year from June 14, 1912. The complaint alleges that "thereafter and on the — day of October, 1912, the plaintiff made due and sufficient notice of the fire, and proof of loss in the form required by said defendant and caused the same to be filed with said defendant company, which said proof was filed and accepted by said defendant company. That plaintiff herein has duly and fully performed all of the terms, conditions, and obligations of said policy upon his part to be kept and performed. That upon the — day of October, 1912, said defendant company made a full and complete investigation of said fire, and assessed and established the loss of this plaintiff to be about the sum of $1,600."

These quoted excerpts from the complaint are denied by the answer.

It is admitted that the house was totally destroyed by fire, October 2, 1912. The plaintiff's allegation of his ownership of the property is traversed. It is admitted, as he alleges in substance, that a few days after the fire, in an action in the circuit court for Marion county against the plaintiff here, the plaintiff in an action caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon the funds in the hands of the defendant company, owing to this plaintiff. The complaint charges, in substance, that after the attachment was levied the plaintiff demanded from defendant the amount of the policy, and the latter represented that payment would be made and the loss fully adjusted and satisfied as soon as the attachment proceedings had been determined and disposed of, which representations were continued until after a year had elapsed from the date of the fire, after which the company refused absolutely to pay anything whatever; that the assurances of payment after the settlement of the attachment proceedings were made for the purpose of deceiving the plaintiff and causing him not to bring any action against the defendant; that, believing such representations to be true, he was induced thereby not to sue within the time prescribed by the policy; and that on account of said representations the defendant ought not now to be permitted to say that the action was not commenced within the time limited by the contract. Averring that no part of the insurance money has been paid, the plaintiff demands judgment therefor, with interest and costs. A copy of the policy is appended to the complaint as an exhibit.

The matter about promising to pay as soon as the attachment had been determined and the charges of deception on the part of the defendant were denied by the answer.

Among other defenses, the defendant, reciting the contents of the policy on that point, avers that the plaintiff did not within sixty days after the fire, and has not at any time, rendered any statement to the defendant containing any of the matters or things required by the said policy of insurance, nor did he within sixty days after the fire or at any time since offer any proof of his loss; and, further, that no suit or action on the policy was commenced within twelve months next after the fire, or at any time before this action was begun, which itself was not instituted within the time provided by said policy. This was traversed by the reply. By way of estoppel that pleading declares, in substance, that the defendant ought not to be permitted to say that the action was not commenced within sixty days after the fire, "upon the ground and for the reason that immediately after said fire plaintiff herein duly notified defendant thereof, and that said defendant instructed plaintiff that one T. C. Shankland would be the adjuster to adjust the loss occasioned by said fire, and that he should thereafter transact all business in connection with said loss with the said T. C. Shankland, and that thereafter and within sixty days from said fire plaintiff herein met the said T. C. Shankland at the place of said fire, and then and there fully informed the said T. C. Shankland concerning all the facts and circumstances known to plaintiff regarding said fire, and then and there answered all questions concerning the same asked by the said T. C. Shankland, and then and there signed all papers required to be signed by the said T. C. Shankland, and that the said T. C. Shankland then and there informed this plaintiff that he had furnished all information that was necessary, and that he had signed all papers that were necessary to be signed to prove said loss and furnish information to defendant company, and that plaintiff herein relied upon the representations and statements of the said T. C. Shankland, and made no other proof of said loss and furnished no other information concerning the same, believing that he had furnished all information and proof demanded and desired by said defendant company, to said company's agent, the said T. C. Shankland."

Upon similar grounds, based on the allegation that the company had promised to pay the face of the policy as soon as the attachment proceedings were settled, and that the promises were continued until after the one year in which he might sue had expired, it is contended that the defendant is estopped from urging the conventional limitation upon bringing the action. A jury trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff testifies that he effected the insurance on the property, received the policy, took it home with him, and read it in full. It appears without dispute that he discovered the provision therein to the effect that the policy should be void if he were not the sole and unconditional owner of the land upon which the dwelling stood, and inasmuch as he had only a permissive occupancy of that realty, subject to sale for the joint account of himself and the owner of the fee, he returned the instrument to the agents who effected the insurance, and they appended a rider in the form required to cover the apparent estate.

The admitted policy on its face concludes with this clause: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the conditions, provisions, and agreements not in conflict with law or contrary to public policy, contained on the first page hereof and those hereafter placed hereon, and to the conditions placed upon page two hereof, all of which said conditions, provisions and agreements are hereby specially referred to and made a part of this policy; and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any condition, provision, or agreement of this policy, except such as, by the terms of this policy, may be the subject of agreement written hereon or added hereto; and as to such conditions, provisions, and agreements, no officer, agent, or representative of this company shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived any of such conditions, provisions, and agreements, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached."

It is further stated in the conditions that "in any matter relating to this insurance, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company."

Further, that "within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, (the insured) shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by said insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire; the interest of the insured and of all others in the property; the cash value of each item thereof and the amount of loss thereon; all encumbrances thereon; all other insurance, whether valid or not, covering any of said property; and a copy of all the descriptions and schedules in all policies; any changes in the title, use, occupation, location, possession, or exposures of said property since the issuing of this policy; by whom and for what purpose any building herein described and the several parts thereof were occupied at the time of fire."

Again: "This company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition of this policy or any forfeiture thereof by any requirement, act, or proceeding on its part relating to the appraisal or to any examination herein provided for; and the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers when appraisal has been required."

And, lastly: "No suit or action on this policy, for the recovery of any claim, shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months after the fire."

A short time after the fire the plaintiff wrote a letter to the local agent at Portland, notifying him thereof. On October 11, 1912, that representative of the company addressed a letter to him as follows:

"Please be advised that we have heard from San Francisco about your loss at the beach. Mr. T. C. Shankland will be the adjuster; we inclose his personal card. He will send you a telegram addressed to Hubbard on Monday forenoon; it will be sent from Ashland, Oregon, as he was called down there to-day, but Sunday evening he will be able to decide just what evening he will be able to leave Portland for Gearhart park. He stated that it would be necessary for you to be there in order for you to properly sign up required papers."

The plaintiff testified that Shankland preceded him to the scene of the fire, near Gearhart in Clatsop county, and that when he arrived he found Shankland and signed the following:

Investigation Agreement.

Witnesseth, that the undersigned W. L. Gilbert, the insured, claiming to have met with loss by fire of October 2, 1912, to property described for insurance under policy No. 79,721 of the Globe Underwriters' Insurance Company, issued at its agency at Portland, Oregon, on the 14th day of June, 1912, and that the undersigned T. C. Shankland has been detailed by said insurance company as its adjuster in this case to investigate the facts and circumstances of said loss, and to report particulars thereof to said insurance company's offices, for their information, and that it is desired that said attention be given without delay or prejudice to the rights of either party to said policy contract:

Therefore, it is hereby agreed and stipulated that said adjuster may proceed in said investigation and may agree with said insured, in accordance with the provisions of said policy, as to the ascertained or estimated amount of both sound value of, and loss and damage by said fire to, property which said insured claims was described for insurance under said policy, if said agreement can be reached; and that this agreement is and that the said agreement hereinabove referred to (if made) is to be, without reference to any other question or questions which has or have arisen or may hereafter arise under the conditions and stipulations of said policy.

Said insured understands and agrees, that the said adjuster has no authority to waive, modify, or strike from said policy, any of its terms, conditions, or stipulations, nor to revive the said policy should it have become void or voidable from any cause.

Witness our hands Gearhart, Oregon, this 15th day of October, 1912.

Globe Underwriters' Insurance Company,

by T. C. Shankland, Adjuster.

This paper seems to have been executed in duplicate, both copies being offered in evidence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff admits signing one of them, and says that the signature on the other looks like his own, but that he does not remember signing it, although he says that he signed two papers on that occasion. In one place he merely says that he made proof of loss at that time; again, he says that Shankland called one of the papers "proof of loss." This is all denied by the latter. No notice was served upon the defendant to produce any such paper. The plaintiff says that he gave it to Shankland. The latter, however, was not called upon, as far as the record discloses, to produce the writing, and the only evidence about it on the part of plaintiff is his mere statement that he made proof of loss. There is no pretense in the testimony on his behalf that the instrument contained any of the stipulated requisites for such a writing. By the terms of the policy, which the plaintiff himself says he read with care, it is stipulated that action to recover for the loss must be brought within one year after the fire. Respecting the matter of the delay beyond that period, he says that on a subsequent occasion Shankland told him the loss could not be paid until after the attachment action was settled.

Urged by his counsel to tell everything, he said: "As near as I can remember, he said he didn't think there would be any trouble with the company about paying the policy when the lumber company was settled with."

Asked to tell fully what was said, plaintiff testified as follows:

A. Well, I don't know as there was very much else said, only what I have stated here.

Q. Well, I want you to go over the whole thing, just as though you had never mentioned it before, Mr. Gilbert.

A. He said he had no right, because I didn't put in my proof of loss.

Q. Was that the time when you went down there thirty days after the fire?

A. No.

Q. Well, now, that is the conversation we are talking about now, and I want you to confine yourself to that, and tell what he said, and all that he said.

A. Well, he didn't say anything at that time, only just that I couldn't have my money until that case was settled. That is about all he did say about it. I don't remember of his saying anything else that I can recall to memory now; it is some time ago.

All the matter relied upon by the plaintiff to prove either waiver or estoppel is found in the evidence about the declarations of Shankland. No other statement of any other person in any way connected with the defendant company is put forth in support of the contention that the plaintiff was excused from furnishing proof of loss, or from commencing his action within one year next after the fire. It is necessary, therefore, to determine the extent of Shankland's authority to bind the company.

It is well settled that one dealing with the agent of another does so at his peril, and must be prepared to show that the other is really the agent of the principal sought to be charged, or that the latter has given the supposed agent apparent power to act as he did in the matter in question, or, with knowledge of his doings or statements, has ratified the same, or has waived his want of authority, or is in some manner estopped to deny the same. Rumble v. Cummings, 52 Or. 203, 208, 95 Pac. 1111; Baker v. Seawear, 63 Or. 350, 127 Pac. 961; Sharp v. Kilborn, 64 Or. 371, 130 Pac. 375; Roberts v. Lombard, 78 Or. 100, 152 Pac. 499; Bessler v. Derby, 80 Or. 513, 157 Pac. 791.

It is also a well-established principle that one having knowledge of the limited authority of an agent cannot bind the principal, by any act or statement of the agent, beyond the actual scope of the authority thus known to the one seeking to charge the principal by virtue of something said or done by the alleged agent. Weidert v. State Ins. Co. 19 Or. 261, 20 Am. St. Rep. 809, 24 Pac. 242; Egan v. Westchester Ins. Co. 28 Or. 289, 42 Pac. 611; Leavitt v. Dimmick, 86 Or. 278, 168 Pac. 292.

The following extract from 1 Mechem on Agency, § 707, is apropos to the discussion: "Parties dealing with an agent known by them to be acting only under an express grant, whether the authority be general or special, are bound to take notice of the nature and extent of the authority conferred. They must be regarded as dealing with that grant before them, and are bound at their peril to notice the limitations thereto prescribed, either by its own terms or by construction of law. . . . So, where the act assumed to be done by the agent is one for which the authority is required by law to be conferred by a written instrument or by a writing under seal, the parties dealing with him must take notice of that fact, and they will be bound by any limitations or restrictions contained therein, although they have not had actual knowledge of them."

The doctrine of the latter part of this excerpt is applicable to the requirement of the statute about the necessary conditions of fire insurance policies, wherein it is prescribed that "in any matter relating to this insurance, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company."

Under the sanction of this law, the plaintiff was charged with knowledge that the authority of Shankland must be in writing, and hence the limits of the alleged agent's power were imputed to the former by operation of law. In addition to this, he himself confessedly agreed in writing to the special scope of Shankland's agency. Admittedly, the plaintiff was informed that Shankland would be the adjuster. No further authority was conferred upon him by the letter addressed to the plaintiff and already quoted. It is prescribed in the policy itself that the company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition thereof, or any forfeiture thereof, by any requirement, act, or proceeding on its part, relating to the appraisal, or to any examination therein provided for. The plaintiff knew this, because, as he said, he read the policy before the fire. Moreover, in the document which he signed at the time the adjuster inspected the ruins, he expressly stipulated that "said insured understands and agrees that the said adjuster has no authority to waive, modify, or strike from said policy, any of its terms, conditions, or stipulations, nor to revive the said policy should it have become void or voidable from any cause."

Beyond this, the general scope of that agreement which he admits signing was merely that the adjuster was to investigate the facts and circumstances of the loss, and, if possible, agree as to the amount of loss and damage, "without reference to any other question or questions which has or have arisen, or may hereafter arise, under the conditions and stipulations of said policy."

The plain construction of this writing, which the plaintiff does not in the least attempt to impeach for fraud, mistake, or any other reason, makes it manifest that the agency of Shankland was limited, within the knowledge of the plaintiff, to the mere question of ascertaining the amount of the loss, without dealing in any manner or to any degree with any other question then or thereafter to be involved between the parties. Under the stipulated limitation of the so-called agent's power, it can make no difference what the latter said respecting the proof of loss, or the sufficiency for that purpose of the papers which the plaintiff signed. It is stated in § 712, L. O. L., that "There shall be no evidence of the contents of a writing other than the writing itself, except in the following cases:

"1. When the original is in the possession of the party against whom the evidence is offered, and he withholds it under the circumstances mentioned in § 782.

"2. When the original cannot be produced by the party by whom the evidence is offered, in a reasonable time, with proper diligence, and its absence is not owing to his neglect or default."

This section closes with the rule that, in the cases mentioned in the subdivisions here quoted, either a copy or oral evidence of the contents of the instrument shall be produced.

Section 782, L. O. L., to which reference is made in the quoted matter above set forth, reads thus: "The original writing shall be produced and proved except as provided in § 712. If the writing be in the custody of the adverse party, he must first have reasonable notice to produce it. If he then fail to do so, the contents of the writing may be proved as in case of its loss; but the notice to produce it is not necessary where the writing itself is a notice, or where it has been wrongfully obtained or withheld by the adverse party."

For the plaintiff, as a witness, to call a paper "proof of loss," is but a legal conclusion. It is not evidence of the contents of the paper required by the Code, even if a showing had been made authorizing the admission of oral statements on that subject. It is a reasonable rule that the witness who gives substituted testimony by word of mouth, in place of the writing itself, should state the language thereof as nearly as possible, so that the court may determine whether it comes within the definition of the instrument in question as embodied in the policy. In Wiseman v. Northern P. R. Co. 20 Or. 425, 23 Am. St. Rep. 135, 26 Pac. 272, the defendant was sued for the value of certain household goods claimed to have been lost by it while transporting the same over its railroad. One ground of its defense was based upon a release to a minimum valuation. It seems that the original of that document had been forwarded to an official in Chicago, Illinois; that the claim agent of the defendant at St. Paul had telegraphed that the files in the office of the traffic manager in Chicago had been searched, and that the release could not be found there. It appears that the instrument had never been in the office of the company at Portland, Oregon. The defendant then offered the deposition of the agent at the origin of the shipment in Michigan, to prove the contents of the release which it seems he had taken from the plaintiff; but this court affirmed the action of the circuit court in denying the right to introduce secondary evidence, on the ground that sufficient diligence to produce the original had not been shown. Other cases on this subject are as follows: Bowick v. Miller, 21 Or. 25, 26 Pac. 861; Harmon v. Decker, 41 Or. 587, 93 Am. St. Rep. 748, 68 Pac. 11, 1111; Gladstone Lumber Co. v. Kelly, 64 Or. 163, 129 Pac. 763; Jones v. Teller, 65 Or. 328, 133 Pac. 354; Muir v.

In the present instance no attempt whatever was made to produce the original, either by calling upon the defendant by notice or upon Shankland by subpoena duces tecum. To sum up on this feature, the special agency of Shankland was confined to the matter of ascertaining the amount of damage, and, if possible, to agree upon that with the plaintiff, without reference to any other question. This did not authorize him to receive proof of loss nor to declare to the plaintiff that the instrument which he signed was proof of loss or sufficient for that purpose. Moreover, no showing was made, allowing secondary evidence of the contents of the instrument. Even if there had been, there was no testimony to show what those contents were, so that the court might be able to determine whether the instrument amounted to a compliance with the express terms of the policy, or supported the plaintiff's allegation that he had performed all the terms of the contract upon his part.

The question of apparent scope of authority has no place in the discussion, for it is admitted that the plaintiff not only knew but agreed in writing upon the limitations of Shankland's agency. As stated, the estoppel, even if properly pleaded, depends entirely upon the statements of Shankland, who, as the plaintiff knew and stipulated, had no authority to bind the company. To hold otherwise would be to violate the express provisions of the policy itself, upon which the plaintiff relies; for it says on the face thereof, which the plaintiff read, that "no officer, agent, or representative of this company shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived any of such conditions, provisions, and agreements, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached."

It would also be violative of the statutory condition, on page 2 of the policy, that "the company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition of the policy, or any forfeiture thereof, by any requirement, act, or proceeding on its part relating to the appraisal or to any examination herein provided for."

As Mr. Justice Ramsey said in Oatman v. Bankers' Fire Relief Asso. 66 Or. 388, 400, 134 Pac. 1033, 1035: "The rules relevant to questions of waiver prior to the enactment of the standard policy law do not apply now. So far as this statute is inconsistent with the common law, it supersedes it. It is the duty of the courts to give effect to the statute, and not to nullify its requirements. This statute not only imposes a penalty on insurance companies for noncompliance with its terms, but it declares in express terms that if the condition quoted supra is not complied with, the policy is void."

The same reasoning applies to the alleged statements of Shankland, upon which the plaintiff relies to excuse himself for not bringing the action within one year, namely, that he knew that Shankland had no authority to bind the company by any such statements. The company cannot be estopped by any unauthorized declaration of its agent where the party urging the estoppel is aware of the limitations upon the agent's authority. It was the duty of the court to construe the legal effect of the admitted writing (L. O. L. § 136), and to declare that no authority existed on the part of Shankland to bind the company in the manner contended for by the plaintiff. The terms of the agency having been admitted and agreed upon in writing, it became the duty of the court as a matter of law to declare what could and what could not be imputed to the company under such circumstances. Glenn v. Savage, 14 Or. 567, 576, 13 Pac. 442; Anderson v. Adams, 43 Or. 621, 638, 74 Pac. 215; Baker v. Seawear, 63 Or. 350, 354, 127 Pac. 961.

For the purposes of this case it matters not whether the question arose upon a departure or the necessity of pleading an estoppel in the complaint. It was held in Mercer v. Germania Ins. Co. 88 Or. 410, 171 Pac. 412, that "in an action on a contract, plaintiff must prove a right to prevail under the contract, unless he alleges in his complaint a waiver on the part of the defendant of some of the provisions of the contract, or an estoppel to assert them as a defense."

But whether we apply this doctrine as showing that the plaintiff has not proved that he fully performed the contract, and that his plea of estoppel in his reply is a departure, or whether we consider the estoppel on its merits, the result is the same; for the latter contention, depending as it does on the declarations of an unauthorized agent, fails for want of proof on the merits.

The whole matter was presented to the court at the close of all the testimony, by motion for a directed verdict, and, on the admitted terms of the policy and the stipulated limitations upon the authority of the agent, upon whose declarations the plaintiff solely depends for either waiver or estoppel, the court should have allowed the motion.

ANNOTATION.

Subsequent denial of liability following promise or negotiations as affecting contractual limitation for action upon insurance policy.

Denial after expiration of limitation period.

Although there are many cases holding or assuming that the insurer, by conduct extending beyond the limitation period, inducing the insured to believe that his claim would be settled without suit, was precluded from invoking the contractual limitation against insured, there are comparatively few which consider the question now under annotation, as to whether such conduct amounts to a definite waiver of the contractual limitation, in the sense that it cannot be revived, or a mere suspension thereof. A majority of those that do consider the question take the view that the contractual limitation is definitely waived, and cannot be revived by a denial of liability, where the insurer's conduct, which justifies the insured in delaying suit, extends beyond the period fixed by the limitation.

Thus, in Galloway v. Standard F. Ins. Co. (1898) 45 W. Va. 237, 31 S. E. 969, where the insurer had promised to pay, and had not denied liability until after the expiration of the six months limited by the policy for bringing suit, it was held that the provision had been waived, not merely suspended, and that the insurer could not thereafter rely on it. The court said: "Now, whether such promise, continuing unexecuted for a time, and then ended by a refusal to perform it, leaving a part of the period reasonably sufficient for suit, would be a waiver of the clause, or merely suspend it from the promise to the refusal to fulfil it, I need not—do not—say. I do say, however, that, where such promise stands for the whole period of the limitation, it is not a mere suspension, but a waiver of the clause of limitation. The mere pendency of negotiations for settlement is no waiver. McFarland v. Peabody Ins. Co. (1873) 6 W. Va. 425. But a promise to pay ends controversy, and by it the company says: 'You need not sue at all. I will pay without suit.' It admits of no other interpretation. Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1890) 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019, held that a promise to pay was a waiver, and barred the company from this defense. The court went further, saying that conduct of the company, inspiring a hope and expectation on the part of the insured party that the loss would be amicably adjusted, would operate as such waiver and estoppel. The court held it an estoppel against the plea, not a mere suspension. It said delay to sue would, in such case, be attributable to the company. It said the waiver need not be in writing. Assurances of settlement, which reasonably throw the insured party off his guard, and lull him into security, will waive the limitation clause, and bar its use by the insurance company. Allemania F. Ins. Co. v. Peck (1890) 133 Ill. 220, 23 Am. St. Rep. 610, 24 N. E. 538; Bonnert v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. (1889) 129 Pa. 558, 15 Am. St. Rep. 730, 18 Atl. 552; St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. v. McGregor (1885) 63 Tex. 399; Bish v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. (1886) 69 Iowa, 184, 28 N. W. 558; Martin v. State Ins. Co. (1882) 44 N. J. L. 485, 43 Am. Rep. 397; 2 May, Ins. § 488. Home Ins. & Bkg. Co. v. Myer (1879) 93 Ill. 271, holds a promise to pay a waiver. We must remember that this clause is for the benefit of the company, inserted by it to limit the period for suit shorter than the general law, and it would be unjust to allow it, by its action, to cause delay in suit, and then plead this clause. Being for its benefit, it may waive it. In determining whether such promise of payment is a waiver or a mere suspension of running of time, we must reflect that the limitation clause is only a matter of contract, not like the Statute of Limitations. It either operates, or is entirely gone by reason of waiver. The statutory limitation fixes a period as a bar, and then says that when there is obstruction to the prosecution of the suit, by absence or other cause, the time of the obstruction does not count. The running of time stops for a time and then begins again,—opens and expands,—because the statute says so; but not so with the contractual limitation."

It may here be remarked that in the Thompson Case, cited in the preceding quotation, the question before the court was whether the failure to bring the action within the prescribed period, computing from the date of the fire, was fatal, and, so far as appears, the court had no occasion to consider what the effect of delay for the prescribed period, computing from the in-surer's denial of liability, would have been.

In accord with the Galloway Case in Lynchburg Cotton Mill Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1906) 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 654, 79 C. C. A. 464, 149 Fed. 954, reversing (1905) 140 Fed. 718, a provision of an indemnity policy that action must be brought upon it within thirty days after final satisfaction of a final judgment for damages by the insured was held waived, and not merely suspended, by the prolongation of attempts at compromise between the insured and the insurer, beyond the thirty-day period. The court said: "The plaintiff in error satisfied the judgment against it on the 15th day of April, 1904, and, under the strict terms of clause 14, suit should have been instituted thereon within thirty days from that time; but, by reason of the correspondence of the parties, this period was confessedly extended from the 15th day of May, 1904, until the 16th day of August, 1904; and the effect of the decision of the lower court is that what occurred operated to suspend said clause to the 16th day of August, 1904, when it was again revived and became operative for a period of thirty days, thereby requiring suit to be instituted within thirty days from the 16th of August, 1904. In this view we are unable to concur, believing that the same is neither supported by reason nor authority. Clause 14 was a limitation prescribed by the contracting parties in the interest of the insurer, and which should be construed most favorably for the insured. Steel v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1892) 2 C. C. A. 463, 7 U. S. App. 325, 51 Fed. 715; Cotten v. Fidelity & C. Co. (C. C. 1890) 41 Fed. 506; 2 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 478; 2 Wood, F. Ins. 2d ed. 120. The insurer had the right to insist on the enforcement of this special limitation, but, upon departing therefrom, certainly in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, what was done operated not as a suspension of the clause, but a waiver thereof; and after such waiver, the general Statute of Limitations of the state, and not the special time named in the contract, governed the parties in the enforcement of the same. The reason for this is apparent; and this case is a striking illustration of what would be the ill effect of a contrary doctrine. No one would ever know when, as to such contracts, the Statute of Limitations began or ceased to run. It would not be determinable from an examination of the contract, nor from the state statute, but would depend upon an uncertain and indefinite state of facts, as to which persons might think differently, and bring about a chaotic condition, which would be exceedingly undesirable. The requirement to sue within thirty days is a stringent clause at best, in contravention of the general law on the subject, and only enforceable because of the special agreement of the parties; and it is one that cannot and should not be revived by implication, if once lost; and, besides, the equities of the case would be unfavorable to the adoption of such a policy. The insurer, knowing his rights under the general law, could afford to waive the clause in question in order to effect an adjustment, and the insured, likewise, to make or entertain such a proposition, realizing that by so doing he would forfeit nothing, and, upon failure, proceed by suit within the statutory period to enforce his claim. The contrary view would result in making practically impossible any effort at compromise between the parties, certainly so far as the assured is concerned. If it be suggested that the benefit of the clause, so far as securing speedy adjustment, would be lost, the answer is that, at least, a specific contract for revivor of the special limitation contemplated after the failure of the settlement should be had, if it is proposed to avoid the statutory limitation."

And in Illinois Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Baker (1894) 153 Ill. 240, 38 N. E. 627, where the insurer induced the insured to delay suing until after the expiration of the period of limitation fixed by the policy, it was held that there was a waiver of the provision, and that this could not be recalled or revoked. The court said: "If any substantial part of the time provided by the limitation is lost by reason of the waiver, the limitation is wholly gone. It cannot be revived, nor can the plaintiff be required to sue within any time short of the statutory limitations."

And in Philadelphia Casualty Co. v. Thacher (1916) 150 C. C. A. 131, 236 Fed. 869, the limitation for bringing suit within one year of the termination of a credit insurance policy was held waived, by an agreement between the insured and insurer to await the result of the bankruptcy proceedings of one of the insured's debtors, which apparently extended beyond the limitation period. The court here expressly stated that the one year's contractual limitation was thus entirely abrogated, and not merely suspended, and the Statute of Limitations was considered to govern the rights of the parties.

And the court in Creem v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1910) 141 App. Div. 493, 126 N. Y. Supp. 555, where a liability insurer, by its conduct in assuming the defense of actions against the insured, waived the provision of the policy limiting the time within which the insured might sue thereon, stated that it could not thereafter rely thereon; that a waiver once established could not be recalled.

In Dibrell v. Georgia Home Ins. Co. (1892) 110 N. C. 193, 28 Am. St. Rep. 678, 14 S. E. 783, where the insurer required the insured to obtain certain papers as a part of his proofs of loss, which necessarily consumed more than the twelve months within which the policy provided suit should be brought, it was held that the provision was waived, and that the insured was free from any restriction as to the time of bringing suit, except such as was imposed by the Statute of Limitations.

Other cases, however, hold either expressly, or in effect, that the conduct on the part of the insurer, which justifies the insured in delaying action until after the expiration of the period prescribed by the contract, does not have the effect to definitely waive the contractual limitation, in the sense that it cannot be revived, but merely fixes a new point for the computation; or, as some cases hold, allows the insured a reasonable time after the insurer has notified the insured of the rejection of the claim.

In Black v. Winneshiek Ins. Co. (1872) 31 Wis. 74, where the loss was adjusted, and the insurer agreed to pay the claim on a certain date unless the insurer should otherwise notify the claimant, and it failed to give notice or pay, and suit was brought shortly after the expiration of the limitation period, it was held that the period from the time of making the agreement to the time payment was agreed to be made should be excluded in the computation of the limitation period. And to the same effect, see Killips v. Putnam F. Ins. Co. (1871) 28 Wis. 472, 9 Am. Rep. 506.

In Goodwin v. Merchants' & B. Mut. Ins. Co. (1902) 118 Iowa, 601, 92 N. W. 894, where the insurer had induced the plaintiff to dismiss a suit commenced within the limitation period, and to agree to arbitrate, and the agreement upon the arbitration had fallen through, it was held that the insurer was estopped to assert the limitation provision, and it was held that, conceding that this did not give the plaintiff a right to sue at any time within the general Statute of Limitations, but only a right to bring action within a reasonable time after the waiver, the plaintiff had complied therewith.

In David v. Oakland Home Ins. Co. (1895) 11 Wash. 181, 39 Pac. 443, where the insurer continued negotiations looking to a settlement until after the expiration of the period of limitation fixed by the policy, it was held waived, and the plaintiff was held to have a reasonable time after rejection of his claim, in which to sue. The court said: "So long as the insured was thus given the right to suppose that the question of adjustment was an open one, he had the right to assume that the condition of the policy as to the time for the commencement of an action thereon had been waived by the company. And such waiver would continue until, by some definite action on its part, the company had notified the insured of the rejection of his claim. After which, he would have a reasonable time in which to commence an action upon the policy."

And in Staats v. Pioneer Ins. Asso. (1909) 55 Wash. 51, 104 Pac. 185, it was held that an insurer could not invoke the limitation provision of the policy involved, where it had, until after the expiration of the period, induced the belief that the claim would be paid, and the plaintiff was apparently held entitled to a reasonable time after the company denied liability, to institute suit.

In Cochran v. London Assur. Corp. (1896) 93 Va. 553, 25 S. E. 597, where the insurer, at the plaintiff's request, had agreed to an extension of the time for bringing suit beyond the period fixed by the policy, it was held that it could not withdraw the extension without the consent of the one to whom it was granted, and could not afterwards attach certain conditions to the consent; and an action brought within the period of extension was held seasonably brought.

The following cases, in which the insurer did not deny liability until after the expiration of the limitation periods, though holding that the insurer could not invoke the contractual limitation against the action, throw but little, if any, light upon the question now under consideration, for the reason that it was not necessary for the courts to decide more than that the failure to bring the action within the time specified, computing from the date of loss, or other date fixed by the contract, was not fatal; it not appearing that the period prescribed had run since the denial of liability:

In some of the above cases, the courts declared in terms that the limitation provision had been "waived," and if it were to be assumed that that term was employed with the precision used in the reported case (GILBERT v. GLOBE & R. F. INS. Co. ante, 205), and as distinguished from "estoppel," they could, perhaps, furnish some indirect authority for the view that the contractual limitation was entirely extinguished. But it is, at least, doubtful whether the courts in these cases deliberately and consciously employed the term in its strict, technical significance, with an appreciation of its logical import as regards the point under consideration. In the Thompson Case, for instance, the court seems to negative any such implication by the statement that the "waiver" need not be in writing, but may arise from such a course of conduct on the part of the insurer as will equitably "estop" it from pleading the prescribed limitation in bar.

Denial before expiration of limitation period.

In the reported case (GILBERT v. GLOBE & R. F. INS. Co.) the insurer denied liability before the termination of the period of limitation fixed by the policy and its prior conduct, leading the insured to believe that his claim would be paid, was held not to waive the limitation provision, but to merely work an estoppel, which was terminated by a denial of liability, from which time the period of limitation prescribed ran.

In some cases, in which the negotiations apparently ceased, by a denial of liability before the expiration of the limitation period fixed by the policy, it has been held that the time consumed in negotiations for a settlement should be excluded in figuring the period of limitations. Allemania F. Ins. Co. v. Peck (1889) 33 Ill. App. 548, affirmed without discussion in this point in (1890) 133 Ill. 220, 23 Am. St. Rep. 610, 24 N. E. 538; Voorheis v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. (1892) 91 Mich. 469, 51 N. W. 1109.

It will be observed that in the reported case (GILBERT v. GLOBE & R. F. INS. Co. ante, 205), although the decision on the question under consideration was against the insured, it was assumed that he was entitled to the full period prescribed by the contract, computing from the time of the denial of liability.

In the following cases, however, where the negotiations for settlement were broken off by the insurer before the expiration of the limitation period fixed by the policy, and a reasonable time remained for bringing suit before the termination of that period, it was held that the insurer was entitled to assert the limitation provision as a defense:

SAM GAY

v.

DISTRICT COURT OF TENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT in and for Clark County et al.

Jury — right — removal from office.

1. No right to jury trial exists in a proceeding for the removal of a public officer from his office, although it is criminal in its nature, where plenary power is conferred by the Constitution upon the legislature to provide for such cases, pursuant to which the legislature has provided a summary and special proceeding which does not include trial by jury.

Courts — jurisdiction of district court — removal of public officer.

2. District courts have jurisdiction of proceedings for the removal of a sheriff from office although such jurisdiction is not directly conferred by the Constitution, if that instrument declares that provision shall be made for the removal of officers guilty of malfeasance or nonfeasance in office, and the statute provides that whenever complaint shall be presented to the district court, charging refusal or neglect to perform duty, it shall be the duty of the court to cite the person charged before it for hearing.

Officer — removal of incumbent — authority of legislature.

3. The power of the legislature is plenary so far as the method of procedure is concerned, under a constitutional requirement that provision shall be made by law for the removal from office of any civil officer for malfeasance or nonfeasance in the performance of his duty.

Courts — power to confer jurisdiction.

4. Powers other than those expressly conferred by the Constitution upon the district court may be conferred upon it under a constitutional provision dividing the powers of government into three departments, and providing that no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one department shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases herein expressly directed or permitted.

Office — removal — complaint.

5. A proceeding to remove a public officer from office need not be in the name of the people where, under authority of the Constitution conferring plenary power upon it, the legislature has established a procedure which does not require such complaint.

Statute — allowance of damages — right to complain.

6. An officer against whom proceedings are instituted to remove him from office cannot complain of a provision in the statute allowing the entry of a judgment against him for damages in favor of complainant, if the parties agree that the provision shall be waived and no such judgment entered in the case.

[See 6 R. C. L. 89.]

7. No one can urge that an act or part of an act is unconstitutional, if his rights are in no way infringed by it.

[See 6 R. C. L. 89.]

8. A title, "Removal of Public Officers," is broad enough to cover provisions for different methods of removal with the procedure necessary to make them effective.

ORIGINAL PROCEEDING in Certiorari to inquire into the jurisdiction of respondents to enter a judgment removing petitioner, as county sheriff, from office. Writ dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. R. Thomas, A. W. Ham, Richard Busteed, and Charles E. Barrett for petitioner.

Messrs. George B. Thatcher, Attorney General, E. T. Patrick, A. S. Henderson, and F. A. Stevens for respondents.

Messrs. McNamara & Van Fleet, amici curiæ.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding in certiorari to inquire into the jurisdiction of the tenth judicial district court of the state of Nevada to enter a judgment removing the petitioner, Sam Gay, as sheriff of Clark county, Nevada, from office.

A complaint was filed in the district court of said county, wherein it was alleged that the defendant, Sam Gay, as sheriff, was guilty of nonfeasance in office, in that he neglected and refused to arrest one Joe Keate, his deputy, while the latter was making an assault with a pistol upon W. H. Harkins, a justice of the peace, in the presence of the defendant. Upon the filing of the complaint citation was issued and served upon the defendant. Defendant did not demur to the complaint, or in any way question the jurisdiction of the court, but filed an answer denying certain of the allegations of the complaint. The matter was heard upon the issue thus raised, and the court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and entered judgment removing the defendant from office.

The Constitution of Nevada, as do the constitutions of the various states, divides the powers of the state into three branches, and provides that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, and in justices of the peace, and authorizes the legislature to establish municipal courts. Section 6, art. 6, of the Constitution, provides that the district courts shall have jurisdiction in certain cases, but does not say that they shall have jurisdiction in proceedings for the removal of any public officer; hence, counsel for petitioner contend that the district court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the charges filed with said court, and to make the order for the removal of the petitioner from office.

Without determining as to the scope and effect of § 6, art. 6, of the Constitution, but conceding for the sake of this matter that the district court acquired no jurisdiction under the section of the Constitution mentioned, we are nevertheless of the opinion that the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter presented in the complaint filed in the district court, charging the petitioner with nonfeasance in office.

Courts—jurisdiction of district court—removal of public officer.

From time immemorial society has found it necessary to make some provision for the removal of venal, corrupt, faithless, and negligent public officers. The importance of this was realized when the Constitution of the United States was drafted, and this policy has been carried into the constitution of every state in the Union. The impeachment of all of the state and judicial officers of Nevada, except justices of the peace, is provided for in article 7 of the Constitution; and while no procedure is prescribed in the Constitution for the removal of other officials, § 4 of article 7 reads: "Provision shall be made by law for the removal from office of any civil officer other than those in this article previously specified, for malfeasance or nonfeasance in the performance of his duty."

It was pursuant to this provision of the Constitution that the legislature passed "An Act Providing for the Removal from Office of Public Officers for Malfeasance or Nonfeasance in Office, Regulating the Mode of Procedure, and Other Matters Properly Connected Therewith." Stat. 1909, p. 293; Rev. Laws, §§ 2851, 2852. Sections 21 and 22 of the act read:

"Sec. 21. If any person now holding or who shall hereafter hold any office in this state, who shall refuse or neglect to perform any official act in the manner and form as now prescribed by law, or who shall be guilty of any malpractice or malfeasance in office may also be removed therefrom as hereinafter prescribed.

"Sec. 22. Whenever any complaint in writing, duly verified by the oath of any complainant, shall be presented to the district court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of said court has been guilty of charging and collecting any illegal fees for services rendered or to be rendered in his office, or has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as prescribed by law, or has been guilty of any malpractice or malfeasance in office, it shall be the duty of the court to cite the party charged to appear before him on a certain day, not more than ten or less than five days from the time when said complaint shall be presented, and on that day, or some subsequent day not more than twenty days from that on which said complaint is presented, shall proceed to hear, in a summary manner, the complaint and evidence offered by the party complained of, and if, on such hearing, it shall appear that the charge or charges of said complaint are sustained, the court shall enter a decree that said party complained of shall be deprived of his office, and shall enter a judgment for five hundred dollars in favor of the complainant and such costs as are allowed in civil cases."

The constitutional convention, in adopting § 4 of article 7 of the Constitution, realized, no doubt, that to confer upon legislative bodies the duty of impeaching, trying, and removing district, county, township and municipal officers would be to place an undue burden upon the legislature, and, furthermore, might in some instances unreasonably delay the removal of vicious officials, and in many cases would afford no relief whatever, in view of the fact that a majority of the officers contemplated by § 4, art. 7, of the Constitution, are elected for only two years, and since the legislature convenes during the month in which the public officers referred to take office, and adjourns at the end of sixty days, not to reconvene until after the term of all county officers shall have expired, and therefore conferred plenary power upon the legislature to provide a special and summary proceeding for the removal of certain officers. State v. Borstad, 27 N. D. 533, 147 N. W. 380, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1014; State ex rel. Payne v. District Ct. 53 Mont. 350, 165 Pac. 294.

Numerous objections are made to the act under which the proceedings in the district court were had, but, as we view the authority conferred by the section of the Constitution mentioned, they may be all brushed aside, save and except such objections only as go to the title of the act. We say this for the reason that the power of the legislature is plenary so far as providing for the method of procedure is concerned. We do not think there is any authority which questions this view. The supreme court of California, in Re Marks, 45 Cal. 199, had under consideration a statute substantially the same as ours, and one which was enacted pursuant to a constitutional provision to all intents and purposes the same as ours. The court in that case said: "The Act of 1853 does provide how, in what manner, upon what procedure, in what court, officers not of the first class shall be tried for that misdemeanor in office known at common law, and recognized in this statute, as neglect of official duty. The power of the legislature to enact such a statute (under the latter clause of § 18) is plain,—as obvious as is the power of the assembly to prefer, and that of the senate to try, articles of impeachment under the first clause of the same section. The power to remove certain officers for misdemeanor in office is exercised only by the assembly and senate under the name of the impeachment; the like power to remove all other officers under like circumstances and for like causes is to be exercised 'in such manner as the legislature may provide.' § 19. The power to provide the manner in which a delinquent is to be tried in the second case is on a footing with the power to directly remove the delinquent by the judgment of the senate in the first case.

In a comparatively recent case, in an opinion by Beatty, Ch. J., and concurred in by the full court, the supreme court of California said: "This is a summary proceeding, regulated, as far as it is regulated at all, by a statute (Penal Code, §§ 758 et seq.) which the legislature has plenary power to pass under the authority of § 18 of article 4 of the Constitution, providing for the trial of public officers for misdemeanor in office otherwise than by impeachment. It is exempt from merely technical rules of procedure. Re Burleigh, 145 Cal. 36, 78 Pac. 242." Re Shepard, 161 Cal. 171, 118 Pac. 513.

The supreme court of Minnesota, in considering the authority of the legislature under a similar constitutional provision in the case of State ex rel. Clapp v. Peterson, 50 Minn. 239, 52 N. W. 655, expressed the following views: "Article 13 of the Constitution, after providing in § 1 for 'the removal of state officers and judges of the supreme and district courts by impeachment,' then provides in § 2 that 'the legislature of the state may provide for the removal of inferior officers from office for malfeasance or nonfeasance in the performance of their duties.' The power thus conferred is plenary, and confers authority upon the legislature to vest the power of removal, and the determination of the question whether cause for removal exists, in any department of the government or in any officer or official body it may deem expedient. There is no requirement that this power shall be conferred only on the courts. Indeed, the very purpose of this provision was to provide a more summary and less cumbersome method of removing inferior officers than by impeachment or by indictment, according to the course of the common law, for malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. If, then, the power of removal vested in the governor by this act be judicial, we have here the constitutional authority for it."

The supreme court of Montana, in State ex rel. Payne v. District Ct. supra, in speaking of the authority conferred by a section of the Constitution of that state similar to § 4, art. 7, of our Constitution, used the following language: "Proceedings for the removal of a public officer do not necessarily partake of the nature of a criminal prosecution. Indeed, the power to remove an unfaithful or negligent public official is not essentially a judicial power. Under our Constitution, its exercise is left to the legislature itself, or to such other authority as the legislature may designate. This is the plain import of § 18 above, and is the general rule in the absence of any constitutional declaration upon the subject. 29 Cyc. 1370; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Doherty, 25 La. Ann. 119, 13 Am. Rep. 131; Territory ex rel. French v. Cox, 6 Dak. 501. The power may be conferred upon the governor (Cameron v. Parker, 2 Okla. 277, 38 Pac. 14), or upon a board (Donahue v. Will County, 100 Ill. 94). It may be conferred upon a court of general or limited jurisdiction to be exercised in the mode provided by law, and consequently, if the legislature sees fit to require a jury trial, a jury trial must be had; but, if it sees fit to provide for a summary hearing without a jury, no constitutional right of the accused is infringed."

In State ex rel. Hamilton v. Grant, 14 Wyo. 41, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 588, 116 Am. St. Rep. 982, 81 Pac. 798, the supreme court of Wyoming, in passing upon the power of the legislature under a similar constitutional provision, said: "The legislature, however, under the provisions of § 19, art. 3, of the Constitution, did have express warrant for the passage of an act for the removal of officers not subject to impeachment, and the method of procedure in effecting such removal is not limited by any other constitutional provision. Atty. Gen. ex rel. Rich v. Jochim, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L.R.A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606, 58 N. W. 611."

In Skeen v. Paine, 32 Utah, 295, 90 Pac. 440, it is said: "Section 21, art. 6, of the Constitution, among other things, provides that such removals may be made 'in such manner as may be provided by law.' Here a plenary power is conferred upon the legislature. This provision of the Constitution is special, and the mere fact that in another part of the same instrument (§ 18, art. 8) it is provided that prosecutions shall be in the name of 'the state of Utah' does not necessarily prevent a proceeding civil in its consequences from being conducted in the name of a private person."

The supreme court of Michigan, in People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart, 74 Mich. 411, 16 Am. St. Rep. 644, 41 N. W. 1091, in passing upon a similar constitutional provision, observed: "It will be noticed that the power conferred by this section of the Constitution is plenary. The legislature is to provide by law for the removal of county officers, etc., in such manner as to them shall seem just and proper. The power conferred is in its nature political, and has reference exclusively to the polity of government, which would be inherently defective if no remedy of a summary nature could be had to remove from office a person who, after his election, had been convicted of crime, or who neglected his duty, or who was guilty of malversation in the administration of his office. Every person elected to a county, township or school district office holds it subject to removal, in the manner provided by law under this section of the Constitution, which commits to the legislature the whole subject of removal. They are to prescribe the mode in which it shall be done, and this includes everything necessary for the accomplishment of the object. The causes, the charges, the notice, the investigation, and the determination, and by whom these shall be conducted and the removal adjudged, are all in the discretion of the legislature."

In State ex rel. Kirby v. Henderson, 145 Iowa, 657, 124 N. W. 767, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1286, in passing upon a case growing out of constitutional and statutory provisions similar to ours, we find the following:

"Section 5 of the act under which this proceeding is prosecuted expressly provides that the 'proceeding shall be summary in its nature and triable as an equitable action.' We think, therefore, that no constitutional right of the defendant was invaded."

See also Moore v. Strickling, 46 W. Va. 515, 50 L.R.A. 279, 33 S. E. 274; Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 843; People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart, supra; State v. Seawell, 64 Ala. 225; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Savage, 89 Ala. 1, 7 L.R.A. 426, 7 So. 7, 183.

In this connection we incidentally call attention to § 1, art. 3, of our Constitution, which reads: "The powers of the government of the state of Nevada shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, the executive and the judicial; and no persons charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases herein expressly directed or permitted."

Thus, we see that the constitutional convention made it plain that other powers than those expressly mentioned in § 6, art. 6, of the Constitution, might be delegated to the district court.

The language of Norcross, J., in Bell v. First Judicial District Ct. 28 Nev. 280, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 843, 113 Am. St. Rep. 854, 81 Pac. 875, 6 Ann. Cas. 982, is not opposed to the view we have expressed. What was said in that case was directed to an entirely different question than the one here presented, as will be readily seen from a reading of the opinion.

But it is urged, and with apparent earnestness, that the complaint in removal proceedings in the district court charged the defendant with a crime, and that he was entitled to a jury trial under that section of the Constitution which provides that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate forever. We think we have disposed of this question by showing that the legislature had plenary power under the terms of the Constitution to pass an act authorizing the removal of officers, and, pursuant to that authority, had passed a law which provided a summary and special proceeding for such cases. In this connection we wish to say that the case of Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 237, 43 Pac. 615, is not in conflict with this view; for, while it is true that the court in that case, as in other cases, held that the proceeding to remove a public officer was criminal in its nature, the court said: "The intent to make it a criminal prosecution is to my mind clear." The opinion then proceeds to give the reasons which induced the court to take that view, and it is apparent that its conclusion was reached because it was the evident intent of the legislature that the proceeding should be criminal in its nature, and not because the Constitution contemplated a proceeding inherently criminal in its character. In fact, strange as it may seem, the reply brief of the petitioner practically concedes as much; for, in answering the contention of respondent on this point, wherein it was sought to show why different proceedings had existed in California in removal cases, counsel say: "The case, Re Marks, 45 Cal. 199, is relied upon by respondent, but it will be noted that the opinion in that case was prior to the adoption of the Codes, and was had under a provision of law which ceased to exist upon the adoption of the Codes."

But the supreme court of California has held that though the proceeding is criminal in nature, under certain statutes, the defendant was not entitled to a jury. People ex rel. Dorris v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 533, 143 Pac. 752.

The contention that the proceeding should have been instituted in the name of the state of Nevada is entirely without merit. As we have shown, the inquiry was had under a special proceeding, provided pursuant to plenary power conferred by the Constitution. Even in California, after the adoption of the Codes, and under statutes which the supreme court of that state held showed a clear intent upon the part of the legislature to make the proceedings criminal in their nature, it was decided that the accusation did not have to be made in the name of the people. Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 843.

Objection is made to that part of the act which provides that the court, in making the order of removal, shall enter judgment for $500 in favor of the complainant. The complainant and the defendant in the removal proceedings expressly ance of damages

agreed that this requirement of the statute might be waived, and accordingly no such judgment was rendered by the court; hence, we are of the opinion that it is not necessary that we determine this question, as it is a well-established rule of law that no one can urge that an act or part of an act is unconstitutional, if his rights are in no way infringed by it. 6 R. C. L. 89; 8 Cyc. 789.

The objection made to the title of the Act of 1909 is without merit.

sufficiency.

The title of the act relates to one subject only, and that is to the removal of public officers. It is true that the act deals with three methods of removal: One by accusation made by the grand jury, one by impeachment by the assembly, and one by accusation by a private citizen. That part of the act relating to impeachment by the assembly prescribes the method of procedure to be followed in the trial by the senate. The act also provides for the summary method by accusation of a private individual, and makes provision for the proceedings after the accusation is filed. And, apparently realizing that individuals are reluctant to file charges against a public official as the basis for his removal, the legislature also made provision for the initiation of proceedings for the removal of a public officer by accusation on the part of the grand jury. In other words, this act not only supplements the constitutional provisions for the removal of state officials, but creates two separate, distinct, and independent methods of removal of county officers. Just why the legislature thought it necessary to create two methods of removal of county officials is not clear, but since one method is more drastic than the other, it may be that the legislature anticipated that there might be occasions when a drastic measure would be needed; but whatever the reason, or lack of reason, the statute, which was enacted pursuant to plenary authority by clear and unmistakable language, creates the two methods, and beyond that we cannot inquire.

For the reasons given, it is ordered that the writ of certiorari heretofore issued be, and the same is, hereby dismissed.

McCarran, Ch. J., concurring:

I concur. Sections 1, 2, and 3 of article 7 of our Constitution lay down the manner and authority by which certain specified state and judicial officers may be removed from office. So far as these officers are concerned, the mode of removal from office is by the Constitution limited and fixed. But in contemplation of the necessity for removal of civil officers other than those designated, § 4 of article 7 of the Constitution provides: "Provision shall be made by law for the removal from office of any civil officer other than those in this article previously specified, for malfeasance or non-feasance in the performance of his duties."

By this provision of the organic law the power was reserved and assigned to the legislative branch of the government to provide a way by which civil officers other than those whose office is within the contemplation of §§ 1, 2, and 3 of article 7 might be removed for malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. To meet this and to provide a rule of conduct by which removal from office might be accomplished as to those officers not affected by §§ 1, 2, and 3 of article 7 of the Constitution, the legislature of 1909 passed the act under which petitioner, as sheriff of Clark county, was brought before the district court. It is the right of the designated authority or tribunal of determination, the district court, to entertain such proceeding as is here questioned. Section 6 of article 6 of the Constitution, in prescribing the jurisdiction of the district court, contains no words of limitation as to matters of which that court may take jurisdiction but rather excludes other courts and tribunals from exercising jurisdiction over those subject-matters specifically named as belonging to that of the district court.

To declare that § 6 of article 6 of the Constitution, by its language, limited the jurisdiction of the district court to matters specifically named in that section, would be to open discussion to any number of matters and proceedings which, by reason of this constitutional provision, would find no jurisdictional resting place. Such was never the intention of the authors of our Constitution.

By § 4 of article 7 of the Constitution the legislative branch of the government was given full power to enact laws looking to the impeachment and removal of civil officers other than those mentioned in the preceding sections. The power to enact such laws implied power to assign the accomplishment of the law's purpose to a designated functionary. The legislature of 1909 carried out this power by designating the district court as the tribunal before which matters of this character should be heard and determined. In enacting the statute and designating the tribunal before which its object should be carried out, the legislature, having full power in the matter, could, as it did, concisely and emphatically outline the steps to be taken and rigidly lay the course to be pursued. Re Shepard, 161 Cal. 171, 118 Pac. 513.

In my judgment, the matter contemplated by the statute cannot properly be termed a criminal proceeding, and I say this, fully aware of the decision of the supreme court of California in the matter of People ex rel. Dorris v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 531, 143 Pac. 752, in which is reviewed the former decisions of that court. Re Curtis, 108 Cal. 661, 41 Pac. 793; Wheeler v. Donnell, 110 Cal. 655, 43 Pac. 1; Re Burleigh, 145 Cal. 35, 78 Pac. 242. It is a proceeding for removal from office, rather than a prosecution for malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. Criminal prosecution might follow after removal, in which event a plea of once in jeopardy could not be interposed.

It is contended that this statute is in contravention of constitutional provisions because trial by jury is not contemplated in the proceeding before the district judge. In this respect, it may be properly said that the proceeding contemplated by the statute is not a trial, but rather a proceeding to remove from public office, and as such does not involve either life, liberty, or property.

The question here involved has in one form or another been passed upon on several occasions by the Supreme Court of the United States, under the contention that by such statute the officer removed was deprived of due process of law under the 14th Amendment.

In the case of Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 23 L. ed. 478, statutory proceedings much more summary than those of ours were considered. In that instance a statute of Louisiana, instituted for testing right to office, was under consideration. The statute was upheld as providing due process of law, and the provision which eliminated hearing before a jury was held to be not repugnant to the amendment.

In the case of Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201, 205, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 8, 97, 28 L. ed. 629, 696, it appears that the attorney general of the state of Kansas proceeded in quo warranto in the supreme court of the state for the removal of a county attorney, alleging his failure to prosecute certain violations of the law of that state. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States on rule, and there, after referring to Kennard v. Louisiana, supra, the court held that the proceeding was of a civil nature, and inasmuch as the process for removal, though summary, provided for bringing the party into court and notifying him of the case he had to meet, and gave him an opportunity to be heard in his defense, and gave opportunity for deliberation and judgment of the court, it constituted due process of law.

In the case of Wilson v. North Carolina, 169 U. S. 586, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 435, 42 L. ed. 865, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 435, the matter grew out of the suspension of a railroad commissioner by the governor of North Carolina. On being carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for that court, said: "The controversy relates exclusively to the title to a state office, created by a statute of the state, and to the rights of one who was elected to the office so created. Those rights are to be measured by the statute and by the Constitution of the state, excepting in so far as they may be protected by any provision of the Federal Constitution."

Continuing, it was said: "The procedure was in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the state. . . . What kind and how much of a hearing the officer should have before suspension by the governor was a matter for the state legislature to determine, having regard to the Constitution of the state." In my judgment, that portion of the statute here involved which would permit of a judgment against the deposed officer of any sum of money is clearly in violation of the constitutional guaranty prohibiting the deprivation of property without due process of law. Even, however, were this involved here, which is not the case, since no such judgment was entered in this matter against petitioner in the district court, it would not avail in furtherance of petitioner's contention, for, under the established rule in this court, constitutional portions of the statute might be enforced, if intact and operative, and unconstitutional portions might be rejected. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Henry, 8 Nev. 165.

A public office is not property within the meaning of the constitutional provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Ashley v. Three Justices (Mass.) and Moore v. Strickling (W. Va.) supra.

The legislature of a state has plenary power to enact laws, providing for the summary removal of officers whose removal is not provided for by the Constitution. Rankin v. Jauman (Idaho); State ex rel. Timothy v. Howse (Tenn.), and People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart (Mich.) supra.

A proceeding to remove a public officer is not a criminal case so as to bring it within that clause of the Constitution which provides for a trial by jury in criminal cases. Rankin v. Jauman (Idaho) and Ashley v. Three Justices (Mass.) supra.

The nature of the proceeding demands immediate and summary action. If the ordinary proceedings of trial by jury were used it would result, in many cases, in the public being left without a remedy, since the term of office of the accused officer would have expired before the case could be finally decided. People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart (Mich.) and State ex rel. Timothy v. Howse (Tenn.) supra. And see the reported case (GAY v. DISTRICT CT.).

The incumbent of a public office holds it, subject to all conditions and statutes affecting it. State ex rel. Caldwell v. Wilson (N. C.) and People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart (Mich.) supra.

In the case of State ex rel. Caldwell v. Wilson (N. C.) supra, wherein it appeared that the governor had suspended a railroad commissioner, pending action by the legislature, under authority of a statute (N. C. Laws 1891, chap. 320), it was held that the commissioner had no right to a jury trial.

In the case of Woods v. Varnum (Cal.) supra, it was held that a tax collector was not entitled to a jury trial, in a proceeding brought to remove him from office for malfeasance. The Constitution (art. 4, § 18), after a provision for the impeachment of certain enumerated officers by the senate, expressly provided that "all other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the legislature may provide." The statute (Pen. Code, § 772) provided for removal in a "summary manner." It was held that this clearly excluded the right of trial by jury.

In Rankin v. Jauman (Idaho) supra, an action was brought to remove a member of the board of county commissioners from office for malfeasance, a statute (Rev. Stat. 1887, § 7459) providing that, on the presentation of an information charging official misconduct, the court must cite the party charged to appear and must proceed to hear, in a summary manner, both sides of the case. By the statute, if the charge was sustained, the court must enter a decree, depriving the party of his office, and enter a judgment of $500 and costs in favor of the informer. It was held that the legislature had power to provide for the summary removal of officers whose removal was not provided for by the Constitution. It was also held that the imposition of a penalty did not make it a criminal proceeding, within the guaranty of a jury trial in such proceedings.

In People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart (Mich.) supra, it was held that a prosecuting attorney had no right to a jury trial, in a proceeding brought to remove him from office. The Constitution of Michigan (art. 12, § 7) provides as follows: "The legislature shall provide by law for the removal of any officer elected by a county, township, or school district in such manner and for such cause as to them shall seem just and proper." The legislature, in pursuance of this provision, enacted a law authorizing the governor to remove all county officers on proof of certain official misconduct. It was held that it was within the power of the legislature to provide a remedy of a summary nature, and that all persons elected to county, township, or school district offices held office subject to removal in the manner prescribed by the legislature.

In State ex rel. Burke v. Jenkins (1908) 148 N. C. 25, 61 S. E. 608, wherein it appeared that the treasurer of a town had been removed by the town commissioners for malfeasance, it was held that he was not entitled to a jury trial, but only to notice and an opportunity to be heard, which had been given him.

In State ex rel. Timothy v. Howse (1915) 184 Tenn. 67, L.R.A.1916D, 1090, 183 S. W. 510, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1125, it was held that a mayor had no constitutional right to a jury trial, since the proceeding for ouster is summary in its nature, and is not an ordinary common-law action. The court said that, since the Constitution does not expressly prohibit the legislature from providing a summary proceeding for the removal of public officers for misconduct in office, it is competent for them to do so.

In State ex rel. Thompson v. Crump (1915) 184 Tenn. 121, L.R.A.1916D, 951, 183 S. W. 505, following the decision in State ex rel. Timothy v. Howse (Tenn.) supra, it was held that, in a proceeding of ouster from public office, defendants were not entitled to a jury trial of the issues of fact presented by the pleadings.

In Moore v. Strickling (1899) 46 W. Va. 515, 50 L.R.A. 279, 33 S. E. 274, wherein a prosecuting attorney was removed from office for gross immorality, it was held that he was not entitled to a jury trial, a public office not being property in the constitutional sense, but a public trust, conferred on the holder to be exercised for the benefit of the public, and, accordingly, not being within the protection of the "due process" clause of the Constitution.

In Ashley v. Three Justices (Mass.) supra, the proceeding was under a Corrupt Practices Act. Three taxpayers, as authorized by that act, brought a petition in the superior court to declare vacant the office of one who had been declared elected and had been inaugurated, on the ground that he had violated the act. The constitutional provision relating to jury trials required a trial by jury in criminal cases, and in "all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has heretofore been otherwise used and practised." It was held that the proceeding was not criminal, though, by the terms of the Corrupt Practices Act, removal entailed a disqualification to hold office for three years; that the proceeding was not one "concerning property," and that the proceeding was of a public nature and not a suit between individuals, and hence that there was no right to a jury trial thereof.

II. Rule in Alabama.

In Alabama, under a special statute (Act of 1819, § 3), a jury trial is provided for court clerks in proceedings brought to remove them from office for malfeasance. Callahan v. State (1832) 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 379. In that case it was held that a court clerk had a right to a jury trial of the charges against him, before being removed from office, as it is expressly provided by § 3 of the Act of 1819, entitled "An Act Specifying the Causes and Manner of Removing Clerks," that all charges against clerks shall be exhibited to the court in writing, and the court shall direct the facts to be tried by a jury, and, on a conviction thereof, such clerk shall be fined or removed from office, as the court of which he is clerk shall think proper.

III. Rule in Texas.

In Texas, a distinction is made between public officers who have been elected and those who have been appointed. In the former case, the office is held to be property, of which the holder cannot be deprived without a trial by jury. Honey v. Graham (1873) 39 Tex. 1. In the latter case it is held not to be property. State ex rel. Maxwell v. Crumbaugh (1901) 26 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 63 S. W. 925. This rule does not apply where the method of removal from a particular office is provided by the Constitution. Davis v. State (1871) 35 Tex. 118.

In Honey v. Graham, supra, wherein it appeared that the governor had removed the state treasurer without a jury trial, it was held that a public office to which the incumbent had been elected was property and a privilege which could not be taken from the incumbent, except as provided by the 16th section of the 1st article of the Constitution: "No citizen of this state shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, or privileges, outlawed, exiled or in any manner disfranchised, except by due course of the law of the land," and, therefore, that the treasurer should have had a jury trial.

In State ex rel. Maxwell v. Crumbaugh, supra, it appeared that a county superintendent of public instruction had been appointed by a county commissioner's court, and that the court thereafter abolished the office, as it was authorized by statute to do. It was held that a public office is not property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

In Davis v. State, supra, it was held that a sheriff had no right to a jury trial, on being removed from his office by the judge of the district court of the county wherein he held office, by authority of a provision of the Constitution of Texas (art. 5, § 18), which reads as follows: "One sheriff for each county shall be elected by the qualified voters thereof, who shall hold his office for four years, subject to removal by the judge of the district court for said county, for cause spread upon the minutes of the court." The court said that the evident intent and purpose of this clause of the Constitution was to put the sheriff directly under the immediate supervision and control of the judges, with full power and authority to remove summarily for any cause, whether punishable as a crime or not, which might hinder and delay the business of the court.

IV. Rule in Utah.

In Utah, a statute provides for a jury trial of all public officers not liable to impeachment.

In Law v. Smith (1908) 34 Utah, 394, 98 Pac. 300, the proceeding was against a sheriff, to remove him from office for malfeasance. The statute under which the proceeding was brought (Utah Comp. Laws 1907, §§ 4565 et seq.) provides (§ 4574) that, if the accused enters a plea of guilty, the court must render a judgment of conviction against him, and, if he denies the charges, the court must proceed to the trial of the accusation. It further provides (§ 4575) that "the trial must be by jury, and shall be conducted in all respects in the same manner as the trial of an indictment, or information for a felony." In the trial court the judge directed a verdict for the defendant. The appellate court held that this was error, and that the jury must pass on the facts of the case under proper instructions as to the law. B. F. D.

STATE BANK OF BLACK DIAMOND, Respt.,

v.

H. JOHNSON et al., Appts.

Assignment — conditional sale contract — effect.

1. An assignment by one who has reserved title to an automobile, under a conditional sale contract, of all right, title, and interest in the purchase money note and memorandum of conditional sale, transfers the right to retake possession of the machine under the contract, and is not a mere election to look to the purchaser for payment, although the assignment guarantees the payment and fulfilment of the contract.

Vendor and purchaser — purchase from one having no title.

2. A purchaser of a chattel acquires no more title or interest in the thing purchased than his vendor has, unless the true owner has, by act or neglect, estopped himself from disputing the claims of the purchaser.

Sale — market overt — right of purchaser.

3. One who purchases from a regular dealer at his place of business an automobile of which he is the apparent owner, but to which he in fact has no title, acquires no title as against the true owner.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of an automobile. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kerr & McCord, for appellants:

The title retained by the seller under a conditional sale is the absolute title which remains in him or passes from him to the purchaser absolutely, accordingly as the conditions of the sale are broken, or as they are fulfilled, or as may result from some act of election on the part of the seller.

Merchants & Planters Bank v. Thomas, 69 Tex. 237, 6 S. W. 565; Parlin & O. Co. v. Harrell, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 368, 27 S. W. 1084; Winton Motor Carriage Co. v. Broadway Automobile Co. 65 Wash. 650, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 71, 118 Pac. 817; MacLeod v. Aberdeen Brewing Co. 82 Wash. 74, 143 Pac. 440; Stewart & H. Drug Co. v. Reed, 74 Wash. 401, 133 Pac. 577; Eilers Music House v. Douglass, 90 Wash. 683, L.R.A. 1916E, 613, 156 Pac. 937.

Even assuming that the title to the automobile did pass to plaintiff as between it and its assignor, yet defendants had no notice, actual or constructive, of the assignment until December 1st, long after they had purchased the car from Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company.

Barbour v. Hodge, 99 Wash. 578, 170 Pac. 115; Scott v. Farnam, 55 Wash. 336, 104 Pac. 639; Barker v. Seattle, 97 Wash. 518, 166 Pac. 1143.

Messrs. Karr & Gregory and H. G. Sutton, for respondent:

The rule of law with reference to passing of title of personal property is that it is controlled by the intention of the parties.

Pacific Lounge & Mattress Co. v. Rudebeck, 15 Wash. 336, 46 Pac. 392; Lauber v. Johnston. 54 Wash. 59, 102

Pac. 873; Collingnon & Co. v. Hammond Mill Co. 68 Wash. 626, 123 Pac. 1083.-

Under a conditional sale contract the vendor retains the title to the property, and has not a mere lien thereon.

Barton v. Groseclose, 11 Idaho, 227, 81 Pac. 623; Dillon & West v. Grutt, 38 Nev. 46, 144 Pac. 741; Keane v. Kibble, 28 Idaho, 274, 154 Pac. 972; Lazarovitch v. Tatilbum, 103 Me. 285, 69 Atl. 275; Pease v. Teller Corp. 22 Idaho, 807, 128 Pac. 981.

The assignment of a conditional sale contract by the vendor carries the title to the property and also the right to bring an action for replevin for same.

Standard Steam Laundry Co. v. Dole, 22 Utah, 311, 61 Pac. 1103; Bank of Little Rock v. Collins, 66 Ark. 240, 50 S. W. 694; Re Lutz, 197 Fed. 492; Duarte v. Minnick, 85 Wash. 539, 148 Pac. 600; 35 Cyc. 335; Barbour v. Hodge, 99 Wash. 578, 170 Pac. 115.

While possession is prima facie evidence of ownership of personal property, yet he who deals with such possession upon the mere evidence which it affords, takes upon himself the risk that there is another and true owner.

Moore v. Robinson, 62 Ala. 537.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a replevin action, wherein the plaintiff bank seeks recovery of an automobile, claiming title to the same by virtue of a conditional sale contract therefor, executed by Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company as vendor, as assignment of all the rights of that company under the conditional sale contract, and forfeiture of the vendee's rights thereunder. The defendants, Johnson and Dahl, claim lawful possession and title to the automobile as innocent purchasers for value. Trial in the superior court for King county, sitting without a jury, resulted in findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendants have appealed to this court.

On September 17, 1917, Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, then being the owner and in possession of the automobile, entered into a conditional sale contract with A. L. Skonnord, looking to the transfer of the title to the automobile to Skonnord, which contract, in so far as we need notice its terms, reads as follows:

Know all men by these presents, that Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, a corporation, of Seattle, Washington, the vendor, on the 17th day of September, 1917, delivered to A. L. Skonnord, residing at Seattle, in King county, state of Washington, the vendee, personal property, described as: One Grant six model K touring car No. 23,494 engine No. 1813 with full equipment thereon, under contract of conditional sale on these terms and conditions at the price of $887.50. . . .

Said property is and shall remain the absolute property of the vendor, or its assigns, until the full payment of the purchase price or of any judgment therefor. . . .

The vendee has paid to the vendor on account of the purchase price the sum of $297.50 and the balance, to wit, $600, is evidenced by the following promissory note, which is accepted as additional evidence of indebtedness and not as payment, viz.:

Seattle, Washington, Sept. 17, 1917.

For value received I promise to pay to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company or order, $600, in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest thereon in like gold coin at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from date until paid, payable in twelve instalments of not less than $50 in any one payment, together with the full amount of interest due on this note at the time of payment of each instalment. The first payment to be made on the 17th day of October, 1917, and a like payment on the 17th day of each month thereafter, until the whole sum, principal and interest, has been paid, if any of said instalments are not so paid, the whole sum of both principal and interest to become immediately due and collectable at the option of the holder hereof. . . .

A. L. Skonnord. . . .

The vendor may at any time sell or assign its interest in the property, including said note and insurance, to any person, and such transferee shall have the same rights hereunder as the vendor.

Time is of the essence of this contract. If the vendee shall make default in the payment of said note, or any instalment thereof, principal or interest, as and when the same shall become due, . . . or sell or attempt to sell, or encumber, said property, . . . it shall be optional with the vendor to (1) declare this contract forfeited and determined, and take possession of said property with or without process of law, and retain all sums paid by the vendee, as and for rent, for the use of said property; or (2) to declare the whole unpaid sum of said note, with interest immediately due and collectable.

Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company,
by Edw. P. Campbell, Pres., Vendor.

A. L. Skonnord, Vendee.

On the date of the execution of the conditional sale contract the rights of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company thereunder were duly assigned by it to respondent bank by indorsement on the back thereof, as follows:

For value received I hereby sell, assign, and transfer to State Bank of Black Diamond all my right, title, and interest in and to the within note and memorandum of conditional bill of sale, and I hereby guarantee the payment and fulfilment of the within contract at the time and in the manner therein stated. . . .

Grant-Coffin-Campbell Co.,

by Edw. P. Campbell, Pres.

This assignment was made in consummation of an outright sale to the bank of all the rights of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company under the contract, and not as collateral or security. Thereafter, on the day following, the conditional sale contract with the assignment so indorsed thereon, was filed in the office of the auditor of King county, as it is claimed, in pursuance of the provisions of §§ 3670, 3671, Rem. Code. A few days after, October 17, 1917, the date on which the first deferred instalment of the purchase price under the conditional sale contract became due, Skonnord, being unable or unwilling to pay any portion of the balance of the purchase price, returned the automobile to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company. Thereafter, on October 25, 1917, appellants, Johnson and Dahl, entered into a contract with Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company for the purchase of a second-hand automobile of the same general description as that described in the conditional sale contract, although not specifically describing that automobile, for an agreed price of $600, paying $20 down thereon. On the following day Edward P. Campbell, of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, delivered the automobile mentioned in the conditional sale contract, and which had been returned to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, evidently in compliance with the contract made between that company and Johnson and Dahl the day previous, executing a bill of sale therefor to Johnson and Dahl, in the name of "Campbell Motor Car Company, by Edward P. Campbell, President." Johnson and Dahl then paid to Campbell the balance of the $600 agreed purchase price. It appears that there was no such corporation or concern as the "Campbell Motor Car Company." On about November 1, 1917, Mr. Karr, attorney for the bank, called

Campbell's attention to the fact that Skonnord had failed to pay the $50 instalment falling due under the conditional sale contract on October 17, 1917. Thereupon Campbell informed Karr that he, Campbell, had promised Skonnord that he would take care of the payment for Skonnord. Whereupon Campbell then paid to Karr, for respondent, the sum of $106, being the instalments and interest falling due October 17 and November 17, 1917. Thereafter, about December 1, 1917, the officers of the bank learned for the first time that the automobile had been returned by Skonnord to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, and that Campbell had assumed to sell and dispose of it to someone. As soon thereafter as the officers of the bank were able to discover that Johnson and Dahl were the persons to whom Campbell had assumed to sell and deliver the automobile, they immediately notified Johnson and Dahl that the bank was the owner of the automobile under the conditional sale contract and the assignment thereof, and demanded possession of the automobile from them. They refused to deliver possession of the automobile to the bank, and also refused to pay the instalment maturing December 17, 1917, then past due, under the provisions of the conditional sale contract. Thereafter, on December 19, 1917, this action was commenced by the bank, seeking recovery of the automobile. Upon the filing of the conditional sale contract in the office of the county auditor of King county it was duly indexed, both direct and inverted, as to grantor and grantee, that is, as to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company and Skonnord, and in connection therewith, at each of the two places so indexed, a notation was made in red ink as follows: "Assigned to the State Bank of Black Diamond." The facts so far related by us are either admitted or appear in the record uncontroverted. The trial court found, however, touching the question of the knowledge of Johnson and Dahl of the bank's claim of title to the automobile, as follows: "That the defendants herein, and each of them, prior to taking possession of said automobile or paying any money therefor, either knew or could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have known that the plaintiff herein was the owner of said automobile under and by virtue of the said memorandum of conditional sale, and that they were not bona fide purchasers thereof without notice."

It is first contended by appellants, Johnson and Dahl, that respondent bank did not acquire the legal title to the automobile by the assignment of the interest of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company in the note and conditional sale contract, and that the assignment became, in effect, an election on the part of both parties thereto to vest title to the automobile in Skonnord, and thereafter to look to him only as a debtor, owing the balance of the purchase price therefor. It seems plain that, since the legal title to the automobile remained in Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company by the express terms of the conditional sale contract, there was no legal impediment to that company transferring its title to the automobile to the bank, of course, subject to Skonnord's right to perfect his title by the payment of the balance due upon the purchase price, as against the bank as well as against Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company. So it becomes a question of the intention of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company and the bank, to be gathered from the terms of the assignment. We have seen that the assignment transferred to the bank all "right, title, and interest" of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company "in and to the within note and memorandum of conditional bill of sale." Now, that company possessed under the conditional sale contract two alternative rights: (1) The right to retake the automobile upon the failure of Skonnord to comply with the terms of the conditional sale contract; and (2) the right to look to Skonnord as a debtor owing the balance of the purchase price. We are quite unable to view the language of this assignment other than as evidencing an intent on the part of both Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company and the bank to transfer to the bank both of these alternative rights, either of which the bank could elect to claim, as Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company could have done had no assignment been made. It is true the assignment guaranteed "the payment and fulfilment of the within contract," but these words, as we view them, had no other effect than to render Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company liable as a guarantor, not only for the payment of the balance due upon the purchase price, should the bank elect to seek recovery of such balance as a debt, but also as a guarantor of the return of the automobile, should the bank elect to claim that right upon the failure of Skonnord to pay the balance of the purchase price.

conditional sale

Counsel rely principally upon our decisions in Winton Motorcar Co. v. Broadway Automobile Co. 65 Wash. 650, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 71, 118 Pac. 817, in support of their contention that there was, by the assignment, an election on the part of both parties thereto to look to Skonnord as a debtor only and to vest title to the automobile in him. In that case, however, there was involved an assignment, by indorsement, of a simple promissory note given by the vendee to the vendor to evidence the purchase price of a conditional sale contract. The note was an entirely separate instrument from the contract of sale. It did not, upon its face, make any reference to the contract, nor did the contract make any reference to the note. The transfer of the note was only a transfer of the right to look to the vendee as a debtor. This, we held, constituted an election to vest title to the property in the vendee, and thereafter to look to him only as a debtor. Had the note and conditional sale contract there involved been embodied in one instrument, and all the rights thereunder assigned as in this case, we think the conclusion reached in that case would have been different. In Barbour v. Hodge, 99 Wash. 578, 583, 170 Pac. 115, observations were made in harmony with this view, though the question was but very briefly noticed therein. In the following decisions, each involving the assignment of a promissory note, and conditional sale contract embodied in one writing, similar to the one here involved, it was held that the assignment of such note and contract and of the interest of the assignor thereunder, though the assignment did not in terms refer to the property, effected a transfer of the reserved legal title to the assignee. Myers v. Yaple, 60 Mich. 339, 27 N. W. 536; Barton v. Groseclose, 11 Idaho, 227, 81 Pac. 623; Lazarovitch v. Tatilbum, 103 Me. 285, 69 Atl. 275; Bank of Little Rock v. Collins, 66 Ark. 240, 50 S. W. 694. We are quite convinced that the assignment by Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company of all its "title and interest in and to" the note and conditional sale contract vested the reserved title to the automobile in the bank.

It is further contended by counsel for Johnson and Dahl that they are, in any event, innocent purchasers of the automobile for value, from one having possession and apparent title thereto, and that they should now be protected as against the claim of the bank. It is argued that the filing of the conditional sale contract and assignment indorsed thereon in the auditor's office did not give to Johnson and Dahl any constructive notice of the bank's title to the automobile, nor even of the title of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company prior to the execution of the assignment, and also that they had no actual knowledge of any facts putting them upon inquiry or requiring them to take notice of the bank's title to the automobile, nor the claim of title of anyone thereto other than Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, the Campbell Motorcar Company, or Edward P. Campbell, from one or the other of whom it may be said they purchased the automobile. It may well be argued that Johnson and Dahl had no constructive notice under the filing and recording provisions of our conditional sale contract statute (§§ 3670, 3671, Rem. Code), since that statute makes no provision for the filing, recording, or indexing of assignments of this nature, and it is not claimed that the assignment was recorded or indexed as a bill of sale under § 5291, Rem. Code. It may also well be argued that since neither Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, Campbell Motorcar Company, nor Edward P. Campbell were holding the automobile as a vendee under a conditional sale contract, there was no occasion for Johnson and Dahl to look to the files or indexes of conditional sale contracts to learn what interest of that nature might be claimed by either of those parties. Our decisions in Howard v. Shaw, 10 Wash. 151, 38 Pac. 746; Fischer v. Woodruff, 25 Wash. 67, 87 Am. St. Rep. 742, 64 Pac. 923; and Dial v. Inland Logging Co. 52 Wash. 81, 100 Pac. 157, might be cited in support of such argument. However, we shall assume, rather than here decide, that Johnson and Dahl had no constructive notice, under the recording provisions of our conditional sale contract statutes, of any claim of title on the part of the bank.

The finding of the trial court above quoted that Johnson and Dahl knew, or could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have known, of the bank's claim of title when they purchased the automobile, which finding, we assume, relates to notice apart from constructive notice under the recording provisions of the statute, is challenged by counsel for Johnson and Dahl as not being supported by the evidence. A review of the evidence leaves us in considerable doubt as to the correctness of this finding. However, let us concede that Johnson and Dahl had no such knowledge as would put them upon inquiry, leading to their discovering the bank's claim of title, in what position do we find them? Simply this, they purchased the automobile from one who had no title whatever therein. They acquired no more title or interest in the automobile when they purchased it from Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, Campbell Motorcar Company, or Edward P. Campbell than as if they had purchased it from one who had stolen it, in which event, of course, they would have acquired no title whatever as against the real owner.

Some contention is made rested upon the fact that Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company was a corporation engaged generally in the sale of automobiles, and that the automobile was purchased by Johnson and Dahl at its place of business, it being then in possession and the apparent owner of the automobile. It is true that possession of personal property is some evidence of title thereto by the one in possession of it, but in order to sustain Johnson and Dahl's claim of title in this case it would be necessary to go to the extent of invoking in their favor the doctrine that a sale in market overt vests good title in the vendee though the vendor had no title, applicable under certain conditions in England, but not recognized as the law in this country. 35 Cyc. 358; 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. Rawle's 3d Rev. 2095. If the vendor has no title, the vendee acquires none, unless the one having title has, by act or neglect, estopped himself from disputing the vendee's claim of title so acquired. It seems plain there is no such estoppel here.

Some contention is made in behalf of Johnson and Dahl, rested upon the theory that Skonnord returned the automobile to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company in satisfaction of all claims against him under the conditional sale contract, resulting in the title to the automobile remaining in that company by agreement between it and him at a time when he had no notice that the rights of Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company under the conditional sale contract had been assigned to the bank. The record convinces us that when Skonnord returned the automobile to Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company he was advised that the note and conditional sale contract had been assigned by that company to the bank. One of the express terms of the conditional sale contract is that "the vendor may at any time sell or assign its interest in the property . . . to any person, and such transferee shall have the same rights hereunder as the vendor."

This plainly suggested the possibility of an assignment, and the evidence in the record tends strongly to show that when the automobile was returned by Skonnord, Campbell then promised him to pay the balance due upon the contract to the bank to the end that he, Skonnord, might be relieved from further obligation under the contract. But even if the facts were as claimed by counsel for Johnson and Dahl touching the question of Skonnord's want of notice of the assignment, the fact still remains that neither Grant-Coffin-Campbell Company, Campbell Motorcar Company, nor Edward P. Campbell had any right, title, or interest whatever in the automobile at the time one or the other of them as-assumed to sell it to Johnson and Dahl. Sale—market overt—right of purchaser.

Whatever view may be taken of any branch of this case, other than of the question of the bank acquiring title to the automobile by assignment of the conditional sale contract, there remains the fact that Johnson and Dahl's vendor had no title to convey, and the want of estoppel preventing the bank from asserting its title to the automobile, the judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Rights as between the assignee of a conditional vendor and one who deals with the latter after the return of the property.

The reported case (STATE BANK v. JOHNSON, ante, 235) is the only case found passing upon the rights of the assignee of the conditional vendor and a subsequent purchaser of the property from him, after it has been returned by the original vendee. This case applies the general rule that an assignment of a conditional sale note or contract carries with it the right to the property, and that hence, where the property is subsequently returned to the vendor, he acquires no title thereto. Hence, a subsequent sale by him does not vest the purchaser with title to the property as against the assignee of the original contract.

A case of interest in this connection is Wayne v. Sherwood (1853) 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 633. In that case a boat was sold with a reservation of title until notes given for the purchase price were paid. The purchaser resold to another person upon the express condition that the latter should pay the notes; and he in turn sold the boat and warranted the title. The latest purchaser paid the notes and then sought to hold the original purchaser for the amount thereof. It is held that in equity the boat was the fund for the payment of the notes, and that the plaintiff was the assignee of the original seller and the second purchaser, and hence he was invested with the rights and subject to the responsibilities of each as to the original purchaser, and that while he held the boat, the notes must be regarded as satisfied, and he could not recover thereon. APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Chancery Court for Tallapoosa County granting an injunction in a suit to enforce specific performance of a contract not to sell ice. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. N. D. Denson & Sons, for appellant:

If the bill is without equity, according to the well-established rule in such cases, the granting of the injunction is reversible error.

(N.S.) 1191, 58 So. 913.

The appellees would avail of the rights they assert against the appellant through a lease of an ice plant from the town of Alexander City, in connection with which they claim to have succeeded by assignment to them of the contract to be quoted. This contract, which was executed by the appellant and the town of Alexander City, is as follows:

For and in consideration of $100 to me in hand paid by the town of Alexander City, I agree to discontinue my ice business in Alexander City and adjacent territory for a period of five years or so long as the present plant is operated by the town or an individual as home plant. I also agree not to associate myself in any way with another individual, firm, or corporation for the purpose of handling ice in Alexander City or adjacent territory for the period as above stated or as long as the plant is operated as a home plant, either by the town or an individual.

This contract is to be void should the town grant license to any other than parties operating the above-mentioned plant.

It is further agreed and understood that the signers of this contract and agreement are to abide by all the conditions herein set out.

It is further agreed that H. W. Pearson is to have five days to dispose of what ice he has on hand and no other.

This bill prays the specific performance of that contract, and that alone, through the permanent injunction of appellant to engage in the ice business in Alexander City and adjacent territory for the time specified in the writing. It is clear that the quoted instrument's whole effect, so far as obligations assumed by appellant were or are concerned, was that appellant should discontinue his ice business in that territory, and refrain from engaging therein, directly or indirectly, for the time stipulated in the instrument. In this writing there is no provision for or about the purchase or sale of appellant's ice business or of any stock or instrumentalities pertaining to his ice business. It necessarily results that the application of the principle stated to the obligation set forth in the instrument above requires the conclusion that the contract is void and unenforceable, —to refrain from business—validity. because it is an effort to impose a general restraint to engage in a certain business in a certain territory. In paragraph 5 of the bill it is alleged: "Your orators would further state, charge, and aver that after the town of Alexander City had leased the ice plant as above set out it did on, to wit, the 2d day of September, 1915, for and in consideration of $100 in cash paid to the respondent, H. W. Pearson, procure an agreement from the said H. W. Pearson whereby he agreed to discontinue his ice business in the town of Alexander City and adjacent territory for a period of five years, or so long as the ice plant located at Alexander City was operated by the town of Alexander

City or an individual as a home plant, a copy of which said contract and agreement is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit B,' and made a part of this bill as if written herein with leave of reference thereto. Your orators would further show that, at the time this said contract was entered into between the town of Alexander City and the said H. W. Pearson, the town of Alexander City also bought from said Pearson all of his ice tools and things necessary for the handling of the ice business and paid him a valuable consideration for the same, and the said H. W. Pearson agreed in said contract that he would not enter into the ice business in the town of Alexander City for a period of five years, or so long as the ice plant at Alexander City was operated by the town or an individual as a home plant."

None or all of the allegations of this paragraph suffice to bring the contract here sought to be specifically enforced through injunctive process within the saving clause of the doctrine before reiterated. While it is averred that, at the time of the contract sought now to be enforced, the town of Alexander City "also bought from said Pearson all of his ice tools and things necessary for the handling of the ice business and paid him a valuable consideration for the same," yet it is not made to appear that this purchase of articles was a part of the written contract of which the appellees now seek specific performance. The contract of the purchase of the chattels mentioned in paragraph 5 was, for aught that appears in the bill, a distinct contract from the one reduced to writing and exhibited with the bill wherein the appellant engaged to refrain from conducting an ice business. Since the contract here sought to be enforced was void as against public policy, its attempted assignment by the town of Alexander City to the appellees conferred upon them no rights they could enforce in a court of equity. Indeed, if this contract had been made with the appellees themselves, the result would have been the same. A bill without equity will not support an injunction of any character under any circumstances. McHan v. McMurry, 173 Ala. 182, 55 So. 793.

Injunction—
equity.

It is further insisted that the town of Alexander City was without power or authority to make the contract here sought to be enforced; that its attempt so to do was ultra vires and void. Whether the powers conferred on this municipality are those enumerated in its charter of 1899 (Local Acts, 1898-99, p. 1706), or those enumerated in the Municipal Code (Pol. Code, §§ 1260, 1261), or in both, we have not been pointed to any provision of both or either of these enactments whereby this municipality was empowered to contract in the manner or to the end disclosed in this bill.

"It is established that a municipal corporation may exercise these and only these powers: Those granted in express terms; those necessarily implied in, or incident to, the powers expressly conferred; and those indispensably necessary to the accomplishment of the declared objects and purposes of the municipality." Colvin v. Ward, 189 Ala. 198, 66 So. 98, and decisions therein cited.

Municipal
powers.

General clauses in charters of municipalities whereby the governing authorities of the corporation are granted expressly, or in equivalent terms, power to do all things that in their discretion may seem necessary for the good order and welfare of the municipality, are only efficient "to grant to that body the right to exercise 'a discretion within the scope of the authority conferred.'" Montgomery v. Montgomery & W. Pl. Road Co. 31 Ala. 76, 83, 84.

—discretionary power.

Even one who has received the benefit of a contract with a municipal corporation is not estopped to set up the want of the corporate authority to make such a contract. Montgomery v. Montgomery & W. Pl. Road Co. supra; Sherwood v. Alvis, 83 Ala. 115, 117, 3 Am. St. Rep. 695, 3 So. 307; Westinghouse Mach. Co. v. Wilkinson, 79 Ala. 312, 314. Since all persons dealing with a municipal corporation are held to a knowledge of its powers and of the powers and authority of its officers, an assignee of a contract ultra vires the corporation can take nothing thereunder. Eufaula v. McNab, 67 Ala. 588, 42 Am. Rep. 118; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 791.

It appears from the bill that this municipality leased from the Tallapoosa Ice & Coal Company its ice plant for a period of five years on the 18th of August, 1915; that about the 1st of January, 1916, the appellees purchased this ice plant from the Tallapoosa Ice & Coal Company, paying for the same and taking possession thereof; that this purchase was made with the knowledge and consent of the municipality and with its agreement that the municipality would surrender and transfer to the appellees the municipality's contract of lease and its contract with the appellant, which agreement was carried into effect, the appellees paying to the municipality about $700 of indebtedness that had accrued on account of the lease contract between the Tallapoosa Ice & Coal Company and the town of Alexander City. It thus clearly appears from the dealing between the municipality and the appellees that the municipality itself is not now engaged in manufacturing ice. Hence there is no foundation for the insistence that the municipality was, when contracting with these appellees, undertaking to exercise any possible power it had to furnish water to the inhabitants of the municipality; if, indeed, such a power could be said to justify the activity of a municipality in manufacturing ice for sale within or without its confines. The sum of what the municipality undertook to do, in respect of its agreement with the appellees, was this: To transfer its lease of an ice plant to individuals for their operation of it, and to vest in its lessees (who are now the owners of the plant by purchase thereof from the municipality's lessor) the obligation of the appellant to the municipality to refrain from conducting an ice business in the territory prescribed for the period specified. Whatever rights the appellees could or do claim as against this appellant could only be traced through their succession to obligations assumed by the appellant to the municipality; and this obligation being wholly void as an effort to create a monopoly, and the municipality being without power to contract as it undertook to do with the appellant, the appellees derived nothing upon which they may invoke the powers of a court of equity to enforce specific performance. The only consideration passing to the appellant was from the municipality, and not from the appellees to the appellant.

The reference, in the written contract above quoted, to the operation of the plant by the town or by an individual as a home plant, was ineffectual to alter the effect of the engagements to the advantage of the appellees; those terms of the contract here sought to be enforced being incorporated therein for the purpose, only, of defining the period of time during which the appellant should refrain from engaging in the ice business in that locality.

The bill is without equity; and, in consequence, the injunction was improperly issued.

Reversed and rendered.

of a business may be sold, apart from the means of carrying it on, and that as an incident to, and to effectuate, such sale, the vendor may bind himself not to compete with the purchaser; and therefore that the only ground upon which the decision in the reported case may be sustained is that the agreement was, under the circumstances, at variance with the public interest.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 8, 1915, Harry Lesser, doing business under the firm name of the Marianna Cotton Oil Mill, brought suit in the circuit court against T. L. Shapard for $876.65, alleged to be due upon an open account. The plaintiff stated that the Marianna Cotton Oil Company, a corporation, had conveyed this account, together with all of its other property of every kind, to him, and that shortly thereafter it surrendered its charter to the state of Arkansas, and lost its legal entity as a corporation. In April, 1915, A. D. Goldman, Blanche L. Goldman, J. L. Isaacs, W. B. Mann, and Jim Thompson filed a motion in the cause, stating that at the time the Marianna Cotton Oil Company surrendered its charter they were stockholders in it and owned all the shares of stock issued by it. They stated that Blanche Goldman owned 796 shares, Harry Lesser, 797 shares, J. L. Isaacs, four shares, and the rest of them one share each, and asked to be made parties plaintiff to the action. The motion was granted over the objection of the defendant. The plaintiff alleged that the balance due was for hulls and meal set out in the account sued on. The defendant answered and admitted that he had received the hulls and meal set out in the account sued on, but stated that he had purchased same from the Marianna Cotton Oil Company, and denied that plaintiffs had any right to recover on said account. The material facts are as follows: In January, 1915, the Marianna Cotton Oil Company, by deed duly executed, pursuant to resolution unanimously passed by its stockholders, conveyed all of its property of every kind to Harry Lesser, and the consideration was that Harry Lesser should pay all the debts of the corporation. The corporation then, by resolution duly passed by its stockholders, surrendered its charter to the state of Arkansas. It was solvent at the time Harry Lesser took possession of its property under the conveyance to him. He paid its debts and thereafter conducted the business under the style of Marianna Cotton Oil Mill. The account sued on came into his possession along with the other assets of the corporation. Other facts will be stated or referred to in the opinion. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $876.65, with accrued interest. The defendant has appealed.

The defendant in his amended answer sets up the following: "That on the — day of —, 1912, he entered into an agreement with the Arkansas Cotton Oil Company, of Helena, Arkansas, by the terms of which he and the said Cotton Oil Company were to erect and operate a cotton gin at Rondo, Arkansas; that the Marianna Cotton Oil Company at that time, and for a long time prior thereto, owned and operated a cotton gin and bought cottonseed at said town of Rondo; that as soon as the Marianna Cotton Oil Company learned that it was to have competition in the gin business and in buying cottonseed at Rondo, it immediately began negotiations with the defendant for the purpose of inducing him to rescind his agreement with the Arkansas Cotton Oil Company (which was competitor of the Marianna Cotton Oil Company), and proposed that if he would do so it would pay him $400 annually for his good will and influence in staying out of the gin business and cottonseed business at Rondo in competition with Marianna Cotton Oil Company; that thereupon by mutual agreement he rescinded his said agreement with the Arkansas Cotton Oil Company, and accepted the proposition of the Marianna Cotton Oil Company, and has ever since abided by and faithfully lived up to said agreement, and has not been in any wise connected with the gin or cotton business at Rondo in opposition to or competition with the Marianna Cotton Oil Company or its assigns."

It is insisted that the judgment should be reversed because the court refused to allow the defendant the $400 annually as set out in that part of the answer just quoted.

Contracts in partial restraint of trade with reference to a business or profession, where ancillary to the sale of the business or profession and the good will thereof, are valid and enforceable to the extent reasonably necessary for the protection of the purchaser. Hampton v. Caldwell, 95 Ark. 387, 129 S. W. 816; Bloom v. Home Ins. Agency, 91 Ark. 367, 121 S. W. 293, and cases cited; Edgar Lumber Co. v. Cornie Stave Co. 95 Ark. 449, 130 S. W. 452. In such cases the vendor, by entering into and observing the covenant not to engage in his business or profession for a stipulated time in a certain locality, secures to himself the full value of his business or profession and its good will, and such contract does not in any wise tend to stifle competition or to the detriment of the public. The good will of a business or profession has a value which the seller has an absolute right to secure in this way. The purpose to create a monopoly in the territory around the town of Rondo is obvious from the matter set forth in the answer.

According to its allegations the Marianna Cotton Oil Company executed the contract in question with the defendant in order to prevent him and another oil company from erecting and operating a cotton gin at Rondo, and thus becoming its competitor in buying cottonseed. The avowed object of the contract, according to the allegations of the answer, was to stifle competition and to promote a monopoly in the cottonseed business to the manifest injury of the public. The contract was not entered into for the purpose of protecting the oil-mill company in a legitimate use of something which it acquired by it; for nothing was conveyed to the oil-mill corporation. The purpose and effect of the contract was to enable the oil-mill corporation to enjoy an illegitimate use of something which it already had. The contract was against public policy, and the court correctly refused to allow defendant to use it as a set-off against the account sued on. Clemons v. Meadows, 123 Ky. 178, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 847, 124 Am. St. Rep. 339, 94 S. W. 13; Tuscaloosa Ice Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 127 Ala. 110, 50 L.R.A. 175, 85 Am. St. Rep. 125, 28 So. 669; 6 R. C. L. § 196, p. 791; Page, Contr. § 434, p. 685.

In Jett v. Theo. Maxfield Co. 80 Ark. 167, 96 S. W. 143, the court held, under our statute, an account is not assignable, and that a party to whom it is sold or transferred cannot sue on it alone, but must make his assignor a party to the action.

In the present case the corporation, before it surrendered its charter, sold and transferred all its assets to Harry Lesser. It is urged that the judgment should be reversed because Harry Lesser did not bring himself within the above rule. After the corporation had surrendered its charter to the state all the stockholders came in and asked to be made parties plaintiff to the action, which was done. It is conceded that they had a right to surrender the charter of the corporation to the state under the authority of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Arkansas Cotton Oil Co. 116 Ark. 74, 171 S. W. 1192, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1178, and Freeo Valley R. Co. v. Hodges, 105 Ark. 314, 151 S. W. 281; but it is contended that under the principles announced in Alf Bennett Lumber Co. v. Walnut Lake Cypress Co. 105 Ark. 421, 151 S. W. 275, that the cause should have been transferred to equity when the stockholders were made parties to the suit. Counsel are correct in this contention, but it by no means follows that the judgment should be reversed for that reason. It is well settled that this court only reverses for errors prejudicial to the rights of the party appealing. The record shows that the corporation was solvent at the time it surrendered its charter to the state, and that Harry Lesser agreed to pay its debts. All persons interested in the assets of the corporation were before the court. It is true the court did not formally transfer the cause to the chancery court, but it reached the same end at which it would have arrived had it done so. The fact that the circuit court reached the same conclusion as the chancery court would have been compelled to have reached had the case been transferred to it shows that the defendant was not prejudiced. See Boles v. Jessup, 57 Ark. 469, 21 S. W. 880, and Eagle v. Oldham, 116 Ark. 565, 174 S. W. 1176, 1199. In other words, the defendant did not dispute that he owed the account sued on. All the parties interested in the assets of the corporation were parties to the suit, and the defendant was not entitled to the set-off claimed by him, for the reason already given.

It necessarily follows that the result should have been the judgment rendered in the event it had been tried in equity. No prejudice, therefore, could have resulted to the defendant, and the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Contract to keep out of a particular business as an unlawful restraint of trade, when independent of any other contract.

I. General rules, 250.

II. Applications of the rules:

- a. Agreement not to compete in manufacturing, buying produce, or doing specified class of work, 251.
- b. Agreement in form of lease of machinery, 252.

I. General rules.

The early rule was that any contract which tended to restrain trade was void, but the rigor of that rule has been relaxed so that many contracts in partial restraint of trade are now recognized as valid. Covenants in partial restraint of trade are now generally upheld as valid when they are agreements by a seller of a business, not to compete with the buyer in such a way as to decrease the value of the business; by a retiring partner, not to compete with the firm; by a partner, not to do anything to hinder the business of the partnership; by an assistant or agent, not to compete with his master or employer after the expiration of his term of service; by the buyer of property, not to use it in competition with the business retained by the seller, and agreements made by the lessor of property, not to use it in competition with the business of the lessee.

It is, however, a very general rule that all contracts in partial restraint of trade must be incident to and in support of another contract, or a sale in which the covenantor has an interest which is in need of protection.

This does not mean, however, that agreements not to compete are necessarily valid when they are incident to a lawful contract, or that they are invalid where the covenantor parts only with the good will of his business. The test to be applied is whether the restraint is such as is necessary to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it is given, and not such as to interfere with the interests of the public. Thus, the ground on which the decision in PEAR-

SON v. DUNCAN (reported herewith) ante, 242, may be sustained, if at all, is not that the agreement was invalid because not ancillary to the sale of the promisor's ice business, but because such agreement was, under the circumstances of the case, at variance with the public interest. Interference with the interest of the public may begin before protection of the purchaser ends. Herein lies the explanation of the fact that in some of the cases hereinafter set forth covenants have been held valid which in other cases are pronounced invalid.

Even where the attempt to restrain trade was made in connection with a sale of a business, but was the subject of a second and independent contract, the courts have held that it was void, where the first contract was fully executed before the second one was entered into. Thus, in Cleaver v. Lenhart (1897) 182 Pa. 285, 37 Atl. 811, where the previous contract of sale of a certain business was complete in all respects, a second agreement, whereby the vendor agreed not to engage in the same business, was void as a mere voluntary agreement in restraint of trade, which could have no legal sanction. So, also, in Prescott v. Bidwell (1904) 18 S. D. 64, 99 N. W. 93, where one partner purchased the entire business of a partnership, including good will, clientage, etc.; and thereafter entered into another agreement whereby, for a fixed sum, the same partner purchased certain articles of the retiring partner; and, as a further consideration, the retiring partner agreed not to engage in the same business, the court held that the restriction was void, though, had it been included in the first contract, it would have been valid under a section of the statute which permits such a restriction upon the dissolution of a partnership.

II. Applications of the rules.

a. Agreement not to compete in manufacturing, buying produce, or doing specified class of work.

A contract by the owner of an ice machine to discontinue the manufacture of ice in a certain town for the term of five years, when made without any sale of his business, and in consideration of payments by the owner of the only other ice plant in the place, in which there was a demand for ice sufficient to consume and render marketable the output of both factories, was held void in Tuscaloosa Ice Mfg. Co. v. Williams (1899) 127 Ala. 110, 50 L.R.A. 175, 85 Am. St. Rep. 125, 38 So. 669, as against public policy, because of the restraint of trade and the creation of a monopoly in the supplying of ice within the town.

And in Oliver v. Gilmore (1892) 52 Fed. 562, a contract which provided that the works, factory, and machinery owned, leased, and controlled by one party should not be operated or used by any person whatsoever for the manufacture of a certain kind of hinges for and during a certain period, in consideration whereof the second party agreed to pay a certain percentage of his sales to the first party, was held void as an illegal restraint of trade.

In Shute v. Shute (1918) 176 N. C. 462, 97 S. E. 392, it was held that an agreement on the part of the vendee of a cotton gin plant that he would not engage or be interested in ginning cotton, or buying cottonseed or seed cotton, for a period of ten years, on the north side of a certain creek in the county, and would remove a gin plant which he was then operating within such territory, the vendor binding himself not to build or cause to be built any ginning plant in such county on the south side of such creek for a period of ten years, was void, because it appeared upon the face of the agreement that this division of the territory was not for the purpose of conveying to the vendee the right to obtain all the patronage of the establishment which the vendor sold to him, but for the purpose of shutting off competition, by preventing the vendee from putting up any other plant or being interested in the establishment of any other plant within all that part of the county north of the creek.

In Chapin v. Brown Bros. (1891) 83 Iowa, 156, 12 L.R.A. 428, 32 Am. St. Rep. 297, 48 N. W. 1074, an agreement by grocers not to buy butter from the producers for two years, if a firm should open a butter store in the place, was held void for lack of consideration, where such firm neither paid anything therefor, nor bought any established plant, place of business, or good will.

In American Laundry Co. v. E. & W. Dry Cleaning Co. (1917) — Ala. —, 74 So. 58, the court refused to enjoin a breach on the part of a laundry company of an agreement whereby it undertook to deliver to the complainant all dry cleaning work which it received from its customers for a period of ten years, and in the meantime not to engage in the dry cleaning business, and the complainant agreed, for the same period, not to engage in the laundry business, on the ground that such agreement was in restraint of trade and tended to create a monopoly in the dry cleaning and laundry business in that locality.

In Field Cordage Co. v. National Cordage Co. (1892) 6 Ohio C. C. 615, 3 Ohio C. D. 613, a contract taking the form of a lease of machinery was held to be, in reality, a covenant not to compete with the lessee, and accordingly to be void.

And in Clark v. Needham (1900) 125 Mich. 84, 51 L.R.A. 785, 84 Am. St. Rep. 559, 83 N. W. 1027, a lease by a firm of all its machinery used in the manufacture of chaplets or anchors, with an agreement that it would not, for five years, manufacture or sell any chaplets or anchors, with some slight exceptions, upon the execution of which lease the lessee leased back the machinery to the first lessor, with permission to use it for any other purpose than the one prohibited, constituted an illegal contract in restraint of trade, where it was not limited as to territory, and the lessor had been engaged in carrying on such business in other states.

In Clemons v. Meadows (1906) 123 Ky. 178, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 847, 124 Am. St. Rep. 339, 94 S. W. 13, a contract between the proprietors of the only two first-class hotels in a town, to close one for a money consideration to be paid by the proprietor of the other, in order to give the latter a monopoly of the business, was held to be contrary to public policy and void.

The case of Wittenberg v. Mollyneaux (1900) 60 Neb. 583, 83 N. W. 842, although in some of its facts quite similar to Clemons v. Meadows (Ky.) supra, differs from the latter case in an essential feature which serves to bring out clearly the distinction between a stipulation not to engage in a particular business, which is ancillary to another lawful contract, and such a stipulation which is not ancillary to another contract. In that case the owners of hotels in the same place agreed to exchange their properties, and, as a part of the agreement, the conveyance made by the plaintiff to the defendant provided that the premises therein described should not be used for hotel purposes for a period of two years. This stipulation was held valid, under the general principle that partial restraints are not deemed to be unreasonable when they are ancillary to the actual purchase of property, made in good faith, and are apparently necessary to afford fair protection to the purchaser. It is apparent that the distinguishing feature in this case, namely, the fact that the stipulation was ancillary to a lawful contract, was lacking in Clemons v. Meadows, although the two cases are quite similar so far as the other facts are concerned.

The same question has sometimes arisen where, in a contract between two carriers, one agrees not to enter into competition with another by refraining from using the same route as the other company. In Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Southern Indiana R. Co. (1904) 38 Ind. App. 234, 70 N. E. 843, an agreement by one railroad not to run tracks to or from certain stone quarries which were connected with the other railroad was held void as in restraint of trade. And in Anderson v. Jett (1889) 89 Ky. 375, 6 L.R.A. 390, 12 S. W. 670, an agreement between owners of rival steamboats to divide profits of the business in a certain proportion, without creating any partnership or any other duty or obligation toward each other; and which also provided that, in case either party sold his boat for the purpose of going out of business, he should not re-engage in it for one year, was held void on grounds of public policy, as an attempt to prevent competition in business. But to the contrary were the decisions in Pierce v. Fuller (1811) 8 Mass. 223, 5 Am. Dec. 102, holding that an agreement not to use a stage in opposition to the plaintiff's stage was valid, the court implying that one stage was sufficient to do all of the business upon that route; and in California Steam Nav. Co. v. Wright (1856) 6 Cal. 258, 65 Am. Dec. 511, holding that a contract between owners of steamboats, whereby one agreed not to permit its steamboats to run on certain waters, was valid on the ground that it did not tend to create a monopoly. And in Leslie v. Lorillard (1888) 110 N. Y. 519, 1 L.R.A. 456, 18 N. E. 363, holding that an agreement by a steamship corporation to buy out a competing line which, in consideration of a monthly payment, agreed to discontinue running vessels between ports mentioned, and not to charter or sell their vessels for use on that route, and not to become in any way interested in the running of steamships between those places, was not void as in restraint of trade.

In Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge (1904) 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879, it was held that the vendor of stock in a corporation had no vendible interest in the good will of the business carried on by the corporation, and an agreement by one selling his stock in the corporation, not to engage in the same business, was void.

But a contrary view was expressed in National Enameling & Stamping Co. v. Haberman (1903) 120 Fed. 415, the court saying: "I cannot regard with favor the claim that the defendant was a mere stockholder in the vendor company, and therefore was not concerned in the good will at all. He has all the qualities which render his restrictive covenant of great value, and, that fact being recognized by the parties, he received $50,000 in addition to his stockholder's share of the fruits of the sale. Possibly his dangerous proclivities were suspected; be that as it may, his superior value was clearly recognized and very well paid for in advance. He ought to be the last man on the list of covenantors to find fault with the bargain which he made, presumably in the best of faith."

The validity of a stipulation on the part of the seller of stock in a corporation, not to engage in a competing business, is also recognized in S. Jarvis Adams Co. v. Knapp (1903) 78 C. C. A. 1, 121 Fed. 34, s. c. on subsequent appeal (1905) 70 C. C. A. 536, 135 Fed. 1008; A. B. Dick Co. v. Fuller (1914) 213 Fed. 98.

The good will of an existing business may, apart from the means of carrying it on, be the subject of sale, and hence a covenant on the part of the seller not to compete with the buyer, which is not unreasonable in respect of the restraint imposed, may be valid.

Thus, a contract, by the terms of which one party agreed to pay to the other a certain sum each month while he lived, and while the promisor remained a corporation, in consideration of his agreement to give up the business of dealing in molding sand obtained from sand banks in a certain county, and not to engage further in it personally, or as agent for any other than the corporation, was held in Wood v. Whitehead Bros. Co. (1901) 165 N. Y. 545, 59 N. E. 357, to be valid, although not connected with a transfer of anything in the way of a business or a plant. The court, speaking through Gray, J., said: "The feature which is said to distinguish this case from our prior decisions upon the subject is that the plaintiff's agreement was unaccompanied by the sale of any business plant, or stock. At the time of contracting with the defendant, he had neither. He was engaged in the business of buying and selling Albany molding sand, and was, presumably, a business rival of the defendant. By this contract, he agreed to discontinue his business and to turn over to the defendant all orders for sand which he then had, or might thereafter receive. The effect of the arrangement was to transfer to the defendant the good will, or custom, of the business which he had built up, and to cease to be its competitor to the extent described. That a man may not contract, as he will, with respect to himself, or to his property rights, demands the intervening of some authoritative reason, founded in considerations of public policy. The denial of the right can only be reasonable, when to permit its exercise is seen to be fraught with consequences injurious to the interests of society. The state has a right to limit individual rights, when their exercise touches the public interests and, if unrestrained, would be prejudicial to order or to progress. The doctrine which avoids a contract for being one in restraint of trade is founded upon a public policy. It had its origin at a time when the field of human enterprise was limited, and when each man's industrial activity was more or less necessary to the material well-being and welfare of his community and of the state. A discussion of the doctrine and the history of the law appear in the cases of Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber (1887) 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464, 13 N. E. 419, and of Leslie v. Lorillard (1888) 110 N. Y. 519, 1 L.R.A. 456, 18 N. E. 363. The conditions which made so rigid a doctrine reasonable no longer exist. In the present practically unlimited field of human enterprise, there is no good reason for restricting the freedom to contract, or for fearing injury to the public from contracts which prevent a person from carrying on a particular business. Interference would only be justifiable when it was demonstrable that, in some way, the public interests were endangered. But contracts between parties, which have for their object the removal of a rival and competitor in a business, are not to be regarded as contracts in restraint of trade. They do not close the field of competition, except to the particular party to be affected. To say, at the present day, that such a contract as was made in this case was affected by a public interest and was a matter of public concern would be, in my opinion, unreasonable. Such a contract not only does not obstruct trade, but it may be for the advantage of the public, as well as of the individual. Story, Contr. § 551. Heretofore, in most of the cases which have come before the courts, the covenant to refrain from a calling within a territory described accompanied a sale of the business itself, with all its appliances or appurtenances. For obvious reasons, that would be so; but, if the calling be one which is followed without a business plant, is any principle of public policy the more violated by a covenant to discontinue it? Clearly not, and this court has not held to that effect. Indeed, its utterances have intimated to the contrary."

And in Brett v. Ebel (1898) 29 App. Div. 256, 51 N. Y. Supp. 573, it was held that a covenant, upon the sale of the good will of the business of soliciting freight for a certain port, not to solicit freights for such port in or from any place in the United States east of the Mississippi river for a certain term, was not without consideration because no material "plant" was involved in the transaction, the court saying: "The good will of a business may be sold independently. A physician may sell the good will of his practice without selling his office furniture or his surgical instruments. So, a lawyer may sell the good will of his clientage without selling his library. The same rule applies to the good will of a mercantile business; in fact, to good will generally."

In Mapes v. Metcalf (1901) 10 N. D. 601, 88 N. W. 713, a stipulation to discontinue the newspaper and job printing business, and not to resume the same within five years, was held to be valid as ancillary to the sale of the good will of the business.

And in Vandiver v. Robertson (1907) 125 Mo. App. 307, 102 S. W. 659, an agreement with a rival newspaper publisher to discontinue the publication of the promisor's paper at a certain town, and at no time, during the time the other party might be in the newspaper business in said town, to resume the publication of that or any other newspaper in said town, nor to engage in or be in any way interested in any newspaper published in said town, was held not to be invalid, although it was not ancillary to any other contract, on the ground that the restraint imposed was so limited that its tendency was not to inflict a loss upon the public.

It does not follow that because, as incident to a sale of the good will of a business apart from any transfer of the property used in the business, a covenant by the seller not to re-engage in the business may be valid, a contract to forego an unexecuted intention to engage in business is likewise lawful. The reason for making a distinction between the two kinds of cases appears to be that, in the former case, the public interest which requires that a seller shall be free to enter into such covenants as will adequately protect the purchaser outweighs the public interest which requires free and unrestricted competition; while, in the latter case, the public interest which seeks to promote competition tips the scale, there being no countervailing interest to be taken into consideration.

Thus, in Webb Press Co. v. Bierce (1906) 116 La. 905, 41 So. 203, a contract by which one who had contemplated engaging in lawful business in a certain place, for a pecuniary consideration, agreed with one with whom he had had no previous relations, and who also contemplated engaging in the same business at the same place, to abandon his plan, was held void as an unreasonable restraint of trade.

And in Gross, K. & Co. v. Bibb (1914) 19 N. M. 495, 145 Pac. 480, an agreement by one who was contemplating the establishment of a store at a certain place in competition with the other party to the agreement, who was at that time engaged in business at that place, to abandon the project, was held to be unlawful, it not being incidental or ancillary to a valid contract for the sale of an established business and its good will, and for the purpose of protecting the good will of the business sold.

And see also in this connection SHAPARD v. LESSER (reported herewith) ante, 247.

But in Sauser v. Kearney (1910) 147 Iowa, 335, 126 N. W. 322, an agreement by one who owned a lot on which the business of conducting a lumber yard could be carried on, and who, in contemplation of engaging in such business, had procured a stock of lumber and placed a small portion of it upon the lot, to sell to another dealer the lumber so purchased, and not to engage in the business at that place for a term of two years, was held valid as ancillary to the sale of a business, the court taking the view that his contract not to engage in the business was not merely a sale of a prospective right which anyone would have to engage in the business in that town if he saw fit.

In Moore v. First Nat. Bank (1903) 139 Ala. 595, 36 So. 777, a contract whereby a contractor abandoned negotiations for the building of a mill, and allowed defendant to take the contract without competition by him, was held not void as opposed to public policy, as the public had no concern in the letting of the contract for the building of the mill, and therefore no interest in maintaining competition.

Receiver — title to assets — suit in other jurisdiction.

1. No title to the assets of a corporation which will permit suit in another jurisdiction, even with the assent of the appointing court, is conferred upon a receiver in an equity suit to wind up the affairs of a corporation, where the statute provides that the assets of insolvent corporations are a trust fund to be marshaled by a court of equity, that a receiver may be appointed of all assets of the corporation who shall, under direction of that court, collect all debts and manage the assets of the corporation as the court shall direct, and that the receiver shall immediately take charge of the business, collecting its assets under the law and rules of the court.

— right to sue — general rule.

2. A mere chancery receiver is but an officer of the court appointing him, and in the absence of some conveyance or statute vesting in him title to the debtor's property, he cannot sue in the courts of a foreign jurisdiction for its recovery upon the mere order of the appointing court, or without other authority than that arising out of his appointment as receiver.

— title conferred by statute.

3. Where the statute under which a receiver is appointed confers upon him title to the property of the debtor, he may sue as of right in the courts of a foreign jurisdiction for recovery of the property.

Appeal — questioning title of plaintiff.

4. Lack of title in plaintiff which will confer jurisdiction upon the trial court may be brought to the attention of the appellate court for the first time on appeal.

CROSS APPEALS from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio (Sater, District Judge) in favor of plaintiff in part only, in a suit to recover sums for which defendant was alleged to be liable because of dealings between it and the insolvent savings company; defendant appealing from so much of the judgment as held it liable; and plaintiff appealing from so much as rejected part of his claims. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Knappen and Denison, Circuit Judges, and McCall, District Judge.

Messrs. Lawrence Maxwell, Ferdinand Jelke, Jr., Landon L. Forchheimer, Charles N. Leslie, Joseph Sagmeister, and I. B. Foraker for defendant.

Messrs. Edmund H. Dryer, Philip Roettinger, and S. C. Roettinger, for plaintiff:

Plaintiff, by express decree of the court of his appointment, is authorized to institute and prosecute this suit. Such rights of action, therefore, as may have arisen and existed to redress the injuries done the corporation, and of any creditor or stockholder, are vested in plaintiff.

Knappen, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as receiver of the Alabama Trust & Savings Company, filed his bill in the court below to recover sums for which he alleged the National Bank was liable on account of dealings between that bank and the Savings Company and its officers. Upon final hearing on pleadings and proofs, the district court found defendant liable for the application of a balance of the Savings Company's deposit in the National Bank, upon paper held by the latter bank, on which the Savings Company appeared as principal maker, but which was found to have been given for the benefit of certain of the Savings Company's officers. Plaintiff's remaining claims were rejected. Both parties have appealed.

At the outset we are met with defendant's contention that plaintiff is without authority to maintain this suit. The Savings Company is a banking corporation organized under the laws of Alabama. In the year 1911, upon a bill filed against it in a state chancery court of Alabama, by certain of its creditors, alleging its insolvency, plaintiff was appointed receiver, and later was given by the Alabama court discretionary authority to prosecute the instant suit, which was accordingly brought in a Federal district court in Ohio, there having been no receivership proceedings, ancillary or otherwise, in that state.

It is the settled rule that a mere chancery receiver is but an officer of the court appointing him, and that in the absence of some conveyance or statute vesting in him title to the debtor's property he cannot sue in the courts of a foreign jurisdiction for its recovery upon the mere order of the appointing court, or without other authority than that arising from his appointment as receiver; and that in the absence of actual conveyance (there was none in this case) the question whether the receiver has title is governed by the statutes of the state by whose court the appointment was made. Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 15 L. ed. 164; Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; Great Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 198 U. S. 561, 573, 49 L. ed. 1163, 1167, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770; Keatley v. Furey, 226 U. S. 399, 403, 57 L. ed. 273, 275, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that, where the statute under which the appointment was made confers such title on the receiver, —title conferred by statute. — he may sue as of right in the courts of the foreign jurisdiction; and such courts will, in respect to such question of title, accept the construction put upon the statute by the highest court of the state. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 534, 51 L. ed. 1163, 1176, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Converse v. Hamilton, 224 U. S. 243, 256, and following, 56 L. ed. 749, 754, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1292. The question is, Under which classification does plaintiff receiver come?

Section 3509 of the Code of Alabama (1907) provides that "the assets of insolvent corporations constitute a trust fund for the payment of the creditors of such corporations, which may be marshaled and administered in courts of equity in this state."

Section 3511, which relates to proceedings for voluntary dissolution of corporations by action of stockholders, provides for the appointment by the chancery court of a receiver of "all the books, property, and assets of the corporation," and that such receiver shall, "under the direction of the court," collect all debts due to, and sell all the property of, the corporation, paying its debts in full or ratably and dividing the residue among stockholders.<sup>1</sup>

Section 3512, which relates to the dissolution of insolvent corporations generally, provides for the appointment of a receiver of all the corporate property and assets, requiring that officer to exercise and perform, "under the direction of the court," the powers and duties required of receivers under § 3511, and to "otherwise manage the affairs of the corporation pending final settlement thereof as the court shall direct."

Section 3560, which is confined to proceedings against insolvent banks, requires the attorney general (upon direction of the governor, based on the state treasurer's finding of insolvency) to institute, "in a court having jurisdiction in the county where the bank or parent bank is located," proceedings "to put the bank in the hands of some competent person;" such appointee being required to give bond in an amount to be fixed by the judge, and to "immediately take charge of the business of said bank, collecting its assets and paying off its liabilities, under the law and rules of such court." It was under these statutes (although upon bill by private creditors) that plaintiff's appointment was made, and by which the question of his title is to be tested.

The decree, after reciting the corporate organization of the Savings Company under the general laws of Alabama, its insolvency, its suspension of business, and inability to resume the same with safety to the public, that its assets constitute a trust fund for the payment of its creditors and "should be marshaled and administered in this court," that upon final settlement it should be dissolved, and that a receiver "should now be appointed to administer its estate," directs that plaintiff "be and he is hereby appointed receiver of defendant, and empowered and directed to demand and take into his possession all the defendant's assets and property to which it is entitled and to recover the same, to be reduced to money and administered under the further order of the court," with express authority to employ counsel and to bring actions at law or in equity "as he may be advised," and to incur expense necessarily incident thereto.

It will be seen that these statutes do not expressly confer title upon the receiver; that they, at least at first view, suggest generally a court direction and control,—an ordinary chancery receivership,—and that the order of appointment specifically provides for the administration of the bank's estate, including recoveries by suit, under the court's order.

In Oates v. Smith, 176 Ala. 39, 57 So. 438, which involved the right of a debtor to set off a debt of the bank acquired after its insolvency against a debt due the bank, the court, recognizing the rule that in ordinary cases of receivership the receiver gets no title to the debtor's assets, passed by the question whether the receiver was vested with the legal title, basing its decision upon the trust fund nature of the assets of the insolvent bank, which of itself forbade such set-off.

In Montgomery Bank & T. Co. v. Walker, 181 Ala. 368, 61 So. 951, which involved the power of the superintendent of banks, under § 10 of Act No. 84 of the General Acts of Alabama of 1911 (in effect when the instant receivership was created) to maintain suit to avoid a fraudulent transaction made by the bank's officials, the court cited National Bank v. Kennedy, 17 Wall. 19, 21 L. ed. 554, as asserting the power of a receiver under the National Bank Act, "as statutory assignee," to collect the assets of the bank; but the opinion contains no suggestion that the superintendent of banks was in fact such assignee. On the contrary, in asserting the constitutionality of the act, as against an alleged lack of due process, the court expressly said (page 378 of 181 Ala.) that it did not "understand the act as making this proceeding operate as a change in the ownership or legal title to the property, but the superintendent is in reality a receiver, who takes charge of the bank for the benefit of the stockholders, depositors, and other creditors."

In the later case of Cobbs v. Vizard Invest. Co. 182 Ala. 372, 62 So. 730, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 801, brought under § 3509, supra, for the administration of an insolvent bank, in denying the right of the receiver (for lack of interest in the distribution) to appeal from a decree allowing the claim of a creditor, the court (page 374 of 182 Ala.) characterized the receiver as "the mere agent of the court for the collection and distribution of the assets of the insolvent corporation under orders of the court which fully protect him," etc., saying (page 375 of 182 Ala.): "The receiver is the mere creature of the court. He must give heed to his master's voice."

In the still later case of Coffey v. Gay, 191 Ala. 137, L.R.A.1915D, 802, 67 So. 681, which involved the right of a receiver of an insolvent bank, appointed under § 3560, supra, to appeal from an order in the principal suit denying the liability of stockholders for unpaid subscriptions, the proposition involved in Cobbs v. Vizard Invest. Co. was reasserted, and upon the same grounds there announced; the court quoting from the opinion in that case the language above set out, and further saying that "this suit the receiver was without authority to bring until he first obtained permission of the court of his appointment."

True, in the still later case of Hundley v. Hewitt, 195 Ala. 647, 71 So. 419, which involved the right of a receiver of an insolvent insurance company, appointed under § 4552 of the Code, to recover unpaid stock subscriptions (under § 3509, supra, and § 3744), the court, in support of the existence of such power, quoted the definition of the title of the "trustee in bankruptcy" as contained in Cartwright v. West, 173 Ala. 202, 55 So. 917, and expressed (page 654 of 195 Ala.) the opinion that "the receiver appointed in this case, acting under orders of the court appointing him,—a court of competent jurisdiction, with full power to settle the affairs of a dissolved corporation,—has rights and duties of a kindred character to those of a trustee in bankruptcy, so far as the question here concerned is involved."

But we find nothing in the opinion asserting that the receiver holds title to the property of the insolvent bank; the implications are all to the contrary.

The instant case is readily distinguishable from cases relied upon by plaintiff. In Relfe v. Rundle (Life Asso. of America v. Rundle) 103 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 337, the "temporary agent and receiver" of the insurance company (page 223 of 103 U. S.) was held (page 225 of 103 U. S.) to be "the statutory successor of the corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs." In Bernheimer v. Converse and Converse v. Hamilton, supra, it was held that under the Minnesota statute, as interpreted by the supreme court of that state, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States, "the receiver is not the ordinary chancery receiver or arm of the court appointing him, but a quasi assignee, and a representative of the creditors." And see Courtney v. Croxton (C. C. A. 6th C.) 152 C. C. A. 235, 239 Fed. 247, 249.

In Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 301, 56 N. E. 888, the bank's receiver, which the Washington court (whose statute was involved) called a "quasi assignee for creditors," was declared by the Massachusetts court (page 579 of 175 Mass.) to be "the owner of the legal title to this fund as a trustee for the creditors." In Howarth v. Angle, 162 N. Y. 179, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 489, the Washington statute was similarly construed.

There is a marked, and not unnatural, tendency in the courts in favor of the construction, where possible, of statutory proceedings for the dissolution of corporations (as distinguished from ordinary creditors' suits) as vesting in the receiver the title to corporate assets (in Great Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 198 U. S. 561, 573, 49 L. ed. 1163, 1167, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770, the receiver was appointed in a creditors' suit); and were it not for the decisions in Montgomery Bank & T. Co. v. Walker, Cobbs v. Vizard Invest. Co. and Coffey v. Gay, — supra, such construction of the Alabama statute would present less dif-faculty. But this construction seems impossible without disregarding these three decisions, and in the face of the fact that neither of the other Alabama decisions cited contains anything necessarily inconsistent with the holdings in the three cases mentioned. In so saying, we have not overlooked the fact that in Cobbs v. Vizard Invest. Co. and Coffey v. Gay, the orders sought to be appealed from were made in the court of principal administration.

We are thus constrained to hold that the Alabama statute confers upon the receiver in the instant case

assets—suit

jurisdiction.

no title to the bank's assets, and thus no right to maintain the instant suit; for

(as said in Great Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Harris, supra, in which the appointing court had authorized the action by the receiver), in the absence of statutory authority therefore, the receiver's right "to sue in a foreign jurisdiction is not recognized upon principles of comity, and the court of his appointment can clothe him with no power to exercise his official duties beyond its jurisdiction. The ground of this conclusion is that every jurisdiction in which it is sought by means of a receiver to subject property to the control of the court has the right and power to determine for itself who the receiver shall be, and to make such distribution of the funds realized within its own jurisdiction as will protect the rights of local parties interested therein, and not permit a foreign court to prejudice the rights of local creditors by removing assets from the local jurisdiction without an order of the court or its approval as to the officer who shall act in the holding and distribution of the property recovered." Page 576 of 198 U. S., 49 L. ed. 1168, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 774.

It follows that in the present state of the record the defendant is entitled to a dismissal of the suit, notwithstanding its apparent failure to call to the attention of the court below the proposition on which our decision is based; for, if plaintiff had no title and no right of action in the court below, that court was without power to render decree in his favor. See Great Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Harris, supra, at pages 577, 578 of 198 U. S. A defense that plaintiff has no title to the asserted right of action is always open.

Appeal—ques-
of plaintiff.

A disposition by this court of the appeal without determination of the merits is unfortunate, and it is with reluctance that we have reached the conclusion that there is no escape from it. But lack of title in plaintiff is not a mere "technicality," in the ordinary meaning of that term, for there is always, theoretically at least, a possibility that defendant may be subjected to further suit by the owner of the title and right of action. The present difficulty could readily have been avoided by ancillary receivership, and the dismissal of the case will not necessarily preclude further proceedings. Whether an ancillary receivership, and an ancillary bill thereunder, would save the present suit from dismissal, we need not decide. See Coal & Iron R. Co. v. Reherd (C. C. A. 4th C.) 123 C. C. A. 155, 204 Fed. 859, 882. Such a question, if presented, would properly be addressed to the court below; and counsel have not been heard upon it here.

The decree of the District Court is reversed, and the record remanded to that court, with directions to take further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

When receiver of corporation deemed to be vested with title to assets so as to entitle him to sue in a foreign jurisdiction.

The scope of this annotation is a somewhat narrow one, its purpose being to ascertain, so far as possible, the force and applicability of the rule that a receiver having title to the assets of a corporation may sue in a foreign jurisdiction. It is not intended to cover the question, upon which there is a variety of judicial opinion, of the extent to which the courts of another jurisdiction will give effect to a title vested in a receiver by voluntary conveyance or operation of law.

Although expressions are to be found in some cases which indicate an understanding that the effect of the rule that a receiver having title to the assets of a corporation may sue in a foreign jurisdiction is to confer upon a receiver vested with the title to the assets of the corporation an absolute right to sue outside the jurisdiction of his appointment (compare language of the reported case (STERRETT v. SECOND NAT. BANK, ante, 257) and of Hopkins v. Lancaster (1918) 254 Fed. 190, that such a receiver "may sue as of right in the courts of the foreign jurisdiction"), other cases indicate that such rule only states a condition which must exist before a receiver will be admitted to sue in another jurisdiction. That the latter is the true view is also indicated by the fact that the state courts (although sometimes differing as to the character of the transfer which will be considered as involuntary) refuse to recognize, except as a matter of comity, transfers of property to a receiver or other judicial officer which are not of a voluntary character; and it has been held that there is no provision of the Federal Constitution which requires them to do so. See Reynolds v. Adden (1890) 136 U. S. 348, 34 L. ed. 360, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843.

Character of transfer determined by law of situs of property.

The courts of the actual situs of the property sought to be reached by a foreign assignee or receiver must for themselves determine whether a particular transaction is or is not such a voluntary assignment as will be upheld under the law and policy of the state. Zacher v. Fidelity Trust & S. V. Co. (1901) 45 C. C. A. 480, 106 Fed. 593.

Force of rule that receiver having title may sue.

Inasmuch as the privilege of maintaining suits is, except in the Federal courts, ordinarily accorded as a matter of comity to a foreign receiver, whether invested with title or not, the question under discussion is of importance only where a receiver seeks to sue in a Federal court outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court appointing him.

In the Federal courts the rule seems to be that a receiver whose rights with respect to the property and assets depend entirely upon his powers as an officer of the court, or upon the order of the court appointing him, and who has not been vested with the title by transfer or statute, will not, even as a matter of comity, be allowed to maintain a suit in the jurisdiction other than that of his appointment.

In Kelly v. Dolan (1914) 218 Fed. 966, affirmed in (1916) 147 C. C. A. 443, 233 Fed. 635, it is said: "A chancery receiver cannot bring an action in his own name outside of the jurisdiction of the court of his appointment, because he does not have the legal title to the property of the corporation or the chose in action, and his representative capacity will not extend beyond the limits of the jurisdiction by which he was appointed. The effect of a statutory receivership, however, may, by force of law, be to transfer to the receiver the legal title to the property of the corporation, including choses in action. The juridical consequence of this is that such a receiver may bring suit outside of the jurisdiction of the authority appointing him, for the reason that he has the legal title, and therefore may enforce it by an action."

And in Edwards v. National Window Glass Jobbers' Asso. (1905) 139 Fed. 795, it is said: "The distinction apparent in all cases is as to whether the receiver has title or whether he is simply appointed an agent or officer of the court under its general equity powers. In the one case, through comity, he may be allowed to maintain a suit in a foreign jurisdiction where such a course would not conflict with local policy or the rights of creditors in such jurisdiction; while in the other, his powers are limited to the jurisdiction of the court appointing him. In the case of Wigton v. Bosler (1900; C. C.) 102 Fed. 70, Judge Dallas, in deciding, in the case before him, that a receiver was not entitled to sue in a jurisdiction outside of that in which he was appointed, questioned, but did not decide, whether, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, Federal courts would, in any case, through courtesy or comity, recognize the right of a receiver to sue in a foreign jurisdiction."

The right of a receiver to sue outside the jurisdiction of the court appointing him, so far as the right to do so depends upon his having title, appears to have been recognized principally in cases (such as Relfe v. Rundle (Life Asso. of America v. Rundle) (1880) 108 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 387; American Nat. Bank v. National Benefit & Casualty Co. (1895) 70 Fed. 420; Avery v. Boston Safe-Deposit & T. Co. (1896) 72 Fed. 700; Hopkins v. Lancaster (1918) 254 Fed. 190; Planters Bank v. Bass (1847) 2 La. Ann. 430; Bockover v. Life Asso. of America (1883) 77. Va. 85; and Parker v. Stoughton Mill Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 174, 51 Am. St. Rep. 881, 64 N. W. 751) in which the receiver or other officer is constituted the virtual successor or representative of the corporation itself, upon the entry of a decree for its dissolution, and in cases (such as Bernheimer v. Converse (1907) 206 U. S. 516, 51 L. ed. 1163, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Converse v. Hamilton, 224 U. S. 243, 56 L. ed. 749, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1292; Hale v. Hardon (1899) 37 C. C. A. 740, 95 Fed. 774; Goss v. Carter (1907) 84 C. C. A. 402, 156 Fed. 746; Irvine v. Putnam (1911) 190 Fed. 321; Irvine v. Elliott (1913) 203 Fed. 82; Irvine v. Baker (1915) 225 Fed. 834; John W. Cooney Co. v. Arlington Hotel Co. (1917) — Del. —, 101 Atl. 879; Howarth v. Lombard (1900) 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 301, 56 N. E. 888; Howarth v. Angle (1900) 162 N. Y. 489, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 489; Shipman v. Treadwell (1913) 208 N. Y. 404, 102 N. E. 634) in which he is invested, by the law governing the stockholders' liability, with the right to enforce such liability, in which he is spoken of as a "quasi assignee" of the cause of action.

It is uniformly held that, without statutory provisions to that effect, no transfer of title follows by operation of law from the appointment of a receiver of the property of the corporation, though authorized to sue.

Thus, a mere appointment as receiver, authorizing the appointee to sue in the state, either in his own name or in the name of the corporation, does not constitute him an assignee of the corporation's property, so as to entitle him to maintain an action in his own name outside the jurisdiction of the tribunal that appointed him. Homer v. Barr Pumping Engine Co. (1901) 180 Mass. 163, 91 Am. St. Rep. 269, 61 N. E. 883.

So, in Hayward v. Leeson (1900) 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, where it appeared that a receiver appointed by a Tennessee court for an insolvent corporation was authorized by his appointment to collect, take possession of, preserve, and care for the assets of the corporation, and dispose of the same under the order of the court, and was directed to prosecute suits in the courts of Massachusetts for the purpose of recovering from the promoters of the corporation assets which it was claimed they had unlawfully withdrawn, it was held that none of the proceedings in Tennessee operated as an assignment to the receiver of the choses in action in litigation, and therefore that the receiver could not sue thereon in his name in Massachusetts.

A receiver appointed upon a creditor's bill filed against a judgment debtor has no such authority as will enable him to go into a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the debtor's property. Booth v. Clark, 17 How. (U. S.) 322, 15 L. ed. 164.

A receiver appointed under the Federal Bankruptcy Act, to collect and bring into custody the assets of the estate and preserve the same until a trustee is qualified to take title thereto, has no title to such assets, and therefore may not act officially outside of the district of his appointment. Re Benedict (1905) 140 Fed. 55; Re Dunseath & Son Co. (1909) 168 Fed. 973.

The question, then, is, what sort of a statutory provision will constitute the receiver the representative of the corporation, as distinguished from the mere custodian of its property.

The Federal courts are bound by the decisions of the state courts as to the interpretation of the receiver's statutory powers. Hopkins v. Lancaster (1918) 254 Fed. 190; STERRETT v. SECOND NAT. BANK (reported herewith) ante, 257.

Under a statute which provides that, upon the rendition of a final judgment dissolving an insurance company or declaring it insolvent, all the assets of such company shall vest in fee simple and absolutely in the superintendent of the insurance department and his successor or successors in office, who shall hold and dispose of the same for the use and benefit of the creditors and policyholders of such company, and such other persons as may be interested in such assets, the superintendent of insurance has a standing in court outside the state. Relfe v. Rundle (Life Asso. of America v. Run-

And see also, as holding that the superintendent of the state insurance department was vested with the assets of an insurance corporation upon the entry of a decree of dissolution, Bockover v. Life Asso. of America (1883) 77 Va. 85.

Under a statute prescribing the mode of proceedings against incorporated banks for a violation of their corporate franchises, and providing for the appointment of trustees to take charge of the assets of the company wherever the same may be found, either in the hands of the officers of the bank or its agents, trustees, or attorneys, to sue for and collect all debts due to the company, and the proceeds of the debts when collected, and of the property when sold, to apply as thereafter may be directed by law to the payment of the debts of the company, and a decree of the court adjudging the forfeiture of the franchise of a bank and appointing trustees, the trustees may be considered as clothed with the legal ownership of the assets of the bank, and may sue a debtor of the bank in another state. Planters Bank v. Bass (1847) 2 La. Ann. 480.

A receiver of the assets of a corporation, appointed, upon its dissolution, as its successor, is, in substance, a trustee appointed by the statutes and the courts to collect and distribute the assets of the corporation, and is vested with the title to them, and hence may sue in a Federal court sitting in another state upon a right of action belonging to such corporation. Avery v. Boston Safe-Deposit & T. Co. (1896) 72 Fed. 700.

The legal effect of a statute, although not expressly declaring the effect of the judgment of dissolution and the appointment of a receiver with reference to the property of the corporation, but which terminates the existence of the corporation and requires the receiver to wind up its affairs and apply its property and effects to the payment of its liabilities, is to invest him with full title to such property and effects wherever they may be found. American Nat. Bank v. National Ben. & Casualty Co. (1895) 70 Fed. 420.

A receiver appointed under the Illinois statute providing for the dissolution of an insolvent corporation is invested with the title to all the assets of the dissolved corporation, wherever situated, and may accordingly sue in the courts of a state foreign to the state of his appointment. Hopkins v. Lancaster (1918) 254 Fed. 190.

Where it appears that the corporation itself is either actually dissolved, or in process of dissolution, and all its property is in the hands of the court, so far as there can be any ownership of such property under such circumstances it must be in the receiver, who may, therefore, enforce in a foreign state a chose in action forming part of the assets of the corporation. Parker v. Stoughton Mill Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 174, 51 Am. St. Rep. 881, 64 N. W. 751.

But a receiver proceeding to wind up an insolvent corporation cannot bring suit in a foreign jurisdiction, where neither the statute authorizing the proceeding nor the decree of the court appointing the receiver discloses any title in him other than that of any ordinary receiver acting in an equity suit. Covell v. Fowler (1906) 144 Fed. 535.

And a receiver appointed to take charge of the assets of a corporation, according to the provisions of a statute providing for the winding up of such corporation,—neither the statute nor the order of the court appointing the receiver undertaking to vest in the receiver the title to the corporate assets,—cannot sue in a court of another jurisdiction except by comity of the courts whose decision he invokes. Zacher v. Fidelity Trust & S. V. Co. (1901) 45 C. C. A. 480, 106 Fed. 593.

In Keatley v. Furey (1912) 226 U. S. 399, 57 L. ed. 273, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, the court, although not deciding the question, expressed the opinion that a statute providing for the appointment of a receiver, upon the filing of a bill for the dissolution of a corporation, to "take charge of and administer" the assets, and for the bringing of suit and the conveyance of property in the corporate name thereafter, and a conveyance made by a special commissioner to the receiver, were ineffectual to give the receiver a standing in court outside the jurisdiction in which he was appointed, the court saying that if the statute did not itself constitute the receiver the universal successor of the corporation, it may be doubted whether the deed had extraterritorial effect.

In Joy v. Midland Sav. Bank (1910) 26 S. D. 244, 128 N. W. 147, it was held that a receiver of a Nebraska corporation appointed by a Nebraska court under a statute forming a part of the charter of the corporation, authorizing the receiver to take charge of and wind up the corporate business, is a statutory receiver, and acquires against the corporation such legal title as is sufficient for the execution of the trust, though the Nebraska statute does not expressly vest title in him, and that the receiver becomes, under the statute, a successor to the corporation, and as such is entitled to full recognition in every state where the corporation may have interests; but on rehearing (1911) 28 S. D. 262, 138 N. W. 276, the court expressed itself as not fully satisfied as to the correctness of its former decision with respect to this phase of the case, and, a determination of the question not being essential to the proper disposition of the appeal, it was left undecided.

A receiver appointed for an insolvent corporation under a statute authorizing the appointment of "a receiver of all the assets and credits" of the company, and providing that the receiver, upon filing his bonds, shall take "possession of all the assets and credits" of the company, is vested with the legal title thereto, where no provision is made in the act for any formal conveyance to the receiver, and it cannot be supposed to have been the intention of the legislature to leave the title to its real estate in the insolvent company, subject to the risks of a judgment lien or other complications. Atty. Gen. v. Atlantic

Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 279, 3 N. E. 193; Michel v. Betz (1905) 108 App. Div. 241, 95 N. Y. Supp. 844.

Under the provisions of the general corporation law of New York, §§ 232 and 239, that a receiver is "vested with all the property, real or personal, vested or contingent, of the corporation," and given power to sue and "recover all the property, debts, and things in action, belonging or due or to become due to such corporation, in the same manner and with the like effect, as such corporation might or could have done if no receivers had been appointed," a legal right of action against the directors for negligence vested in the receiver on his appointment. Kelly v. Dolan (1916) 147 C. C. A. 443, 233 Fed. 635.

The title conferred upon a receiver by a statute providing that "whenever in any case a receiver shall be appointed for a corporation or the trustees thereof, or any copartnership or joint stock company, and the order or decree of the court, judge, or chancellor shall be that the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, funds, assets, moneys, choses in action, rights and interests of every kind, name, and nature, either in law or equity, or any part thereof belonging to the same shall be placed in the hands of such receiver he shall from thenceforward until the further order or decree of the court, judge, or chancellor, have full possession, custody and control thereof, and shall be vested with the title so far as it shall be necessary to collect debts, preserve the assets and property, for the benefit of creditors and all persons interested and may and shall bring and prosecute and defend all suits in his own name that may be necessary for that purpose,"—falls far short of an absolute one, and is no greater nor of higher quality than is ordinarily passed to a receiver appointed under the general equity jurisdiction of the courts in chancery of the country, except as to the right to sue and defend suits in his own name; and such receiver may not, therefore, interplead in the courts of a foreign jurisdiction in order to get possession of a fund claimed by the corporation. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. American Exch. Bank (1897) 71 Mo. App. 658.

Where the statute relating to stockholders' liability gives authority to a receiver to enforce such liability, the receiver may be considered as a quasi assignee and representative of the creditors, and may, therefore, sue in a foreign jurisdiction. Bernheimer v. Converse (1907) 206 U. S. 516, 51 L. ed. 1163, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Converse v. Hamilton (1912) 224 U. S. 243, 56 L. ed. 749, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1292.

A receiver appointed by the Minnesota courts for the purpose of enforcing the liability of the stockholders in a Minnesota corporation may maintain an action in a Federal court of another territorial jurisdiction, against a stockholder resident therein. Hale v. Hardon (1899) 37 C. C. A. 240, 95 Fed. 774.

A receiver of an insolvent banking corporation has the legal title to the fund arising from the enforcement of the liability created by the provision of the Nebraska Constitution, as construed by the Nebraska courts, which provides that every stockholder in a banking corporation shall be individually liable to its creditors over and above the amount of his stock to an amount equal to his stock, and may, therefore, maintain an action in a foreign jurisdiction to recover the amount due from a stockholder. Goss v. Carter (1907) 4 C. C. A. 402, 156 Fed. 746.

An Ohio receiver has, under a statute empowering the court to authorize and direct a receiver appointed by it to prosecute actions in his own name as receiver for the enforcement in other jurisdictions of the double liability of stockholders, sufficient title to maintain an action in a Federal court in another state to enforce such liability. Irvine v. Putnam (1911) 190 Fed. 321; Irvine v. Elliott (1913) 203 Fed. 82; Irvine v. Baker (1915) 225 Fed. 834.

A receiver appointed in the courts of Washington for a Washington corporation, charged with the enforcement of the liability imposed by statute upon its stockholders for debts of the corporation, is in the position of a quasi assignee for creditors and may, therefore, bring an action in another state to enforce such liability in his own name. Howarth v. Lombard (1900) 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 301, 56 N. E. 888; Howarth v. Angle (1900) 162 N. Y. 489, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 489.

A receiver appointed under §§ 3260 et seq. of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, providing for the enforcement of stockholders' liability, is a quasi assignee, invested with the creditors' right of action to enforce the liability of the stockholders, and may, as such, maintain an action in another state. Shipman v. Treadwell (1913) 208 N. Y. 404, 102 N. E. 634, affirming (1912) 150 App. Div. 57, 133 N. Y. Supp. 970, reargument denied in (1913) 209 N. Y. 545, 102 N. E. 1113.

In John W. Cooney Co. v. Arlington Hotel Co. (1917) — Del. —, 101 Atl. 879, it was held that the effect of the Act of 1913, 27 Del. Laws, p. 479, Rev. Code. § 3884, the provisions of which are not stated in the report of the case, is to make a receiver a quasi assignee of unpaid stock subscriptions, and so removes the limitation of an ordinary receiver to the territorial limits of the jurisdiction wherein he was appointed.

But the New York superintendent of banks, in suing in Tennessee to recover of a stockholder an assessment to pay the debt of the bank, does not possess the legal title to the claim sued on, but only the right to sue and collect, and hence can assert such claim only through the exercise of comity. Van Tuyl v. Carpenter (1915) 135 Tenn. 629, 188 S. W. 234.

A complaint alleging that, under plaintiff's appointment as liquidator of an insolvent banking corporation, "all the property, effects, and choses in action to which the said bank was or appeared to be entitled came into its custody or under its control," shows such title in the plaintiff as to entitle him to sue a resident stockholder for his proportionate liability as such stockholder, inasmuch as the payment to the plaintiff would be so complete an acquittance of defendant's liability that it would stand as a bar to an attempted recovery by anyone else. Royal Trust Co. v. Harding (1913) 155 App. Div. 104, 140 N. Y. Supp. 9.

Miscellaneous.

A receiver will be deemed to be only an ordinary chancery receiver, although he is alleged to be vested with title to the assets of the corporation, where no statute or conveyance or assignment conferring title upon the receiver is set out. Hardee v. Wilson (1914) 129 Tenn. 511, 167 S. W. 475, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 94.

The receivers of an insolvent banking corporation may sue in another state on a bond and mortgage taken by them, and so may their successors. Iglehart v. Bierce (1864) 36 Ill. 133.

And a receiver claiming by a conveyance to him as such, and not depending alone on the decree vesting the property in him, may sue in the courts of a foreign jurisdiction to recover real estate. Oliver v. Clarke (1901) 45 C. C. A. 360, 106 Fed. 402.

Right to sue does not connote right to recover.

Although, as above stated, this note does not undertake to collect the cases upon the question as to the extent to which the title of a foreign receiver will be recognized, it seems proper to point out that the rule that a foreign receiver, if vested with title, may sue, does not necessarily mean that he may successfully assert such title.

Thus, in Shloss v. Metropolitan Surety Co. (1910) 149 Iowa, 382, 128 N. W. 384, the court, referring to the case of Relfe v. Rundle (Life Asso. of America v. Rundle) (1881) 103 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 637, said: "On this case and other cases expressly following it, counsel seeks to define some peculiar kind of receivership which shall not be subject to the rule of the courts of this state, that a foreign receiver cannot claim the funds of the company as against local creditors. We do not discover that any of the cases relied upon support such a definition. The right of the creditors in this state to attach the funds of a foreign solvent corporation for the purpose of enforcing payment, notwithstanding the receivership in the state of the corporation's home, is not a matter of procedure, but one of substantive law, and we fail to see how any statute in New York could authorize such receivership as would exempt the receiver from the limitations imposed on his power by the rules of law recognized in this state." E. S. O.

Mr. W. H. Anderson for appellees.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was one to enjoin enforcement of the penal provision of the statute (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 4979), making it unlawful to drill or operate oil or gas wells within 100 feet of the right of way of any steam or electric line of railway. An injunction was denied, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs have an oil and gas lease of a strip of ground from 37 to 50½ feet wide, adjoining the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad on the south. The right of way is 100 feet wide. The track is in the center of the right of way, and the plaintiffs have two producing wells within the limits denounced by the statute. The owners of a lease adjoining the plaintiffs' property on the south are operating a producing well 83 feet from the plaintiffs' south line.

The plaintiffs' lease is entirely valueless, if the statute be valid. The claim is that the statute was not the product of a proper exercise of the police power of the state, that it deprives the plaintiffs of property without compensation, and without due process of law, that it denies the plaintiffs the equal protection of the law, and that it abridges the privileges and immunities of the plaintiffs, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the state of Kansas, and of the Constitution of the United States.

The question is a very narrow one. The police power extends not only to the protection of the public safety, health, and morals, but also to the promotion of the common convenience, prosperity, and welfare. State v. Wilson, 101 Kan. 789, 794, L.R.A.1918B, 374, 168 Pac. 679. While oil and gas wells are not nuisances per se, and the business of drilling and operating them is ordinarily legitimate and harmless, it is conceivable that they may become detrimental in a high degree. The greed for mineral in a rich field becomes insatiate. Steam and electric railway rights of way may be exploited, and unless the works, structures, establishments, activities, and products of mining operations be kept at a safe distance from railway tracks, life and property might be endangered, commerce impeded, and the general welfare seriously affected. If the legislature acted from some such considerations as these, it possessed power to fix a limit within which drilling and operating should not intrude, and the court is unable to say that a free space of 100 feet is unreasonable.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute prohibiting or regulating location of oil or gas wells.

In the reported case (WINKLER v. ANDERSON, ante, 268) it is held that, while oil and gas wells are not nuisances per se, it is conceivable that because of greed for mineral in a rich field, such wells might become objectionable so that since the police power extends not only to the protection of the public safety, health, and morals, but to the promotion of the common convenience, prosperity, and welfare, a statute making it unlawful to drill or operate oil or gas wells within 100 feet of the right of way of any steam or electric line of railway is within the authority of the legislature under the police power, and does not fix an unreasonable limit in naming 100 feet as a safe distance.

An exhaustive search has revealed no other case passing upon the constitutionality of a statute prohibiting or regulating the location of oil or gas wells.

Intoxicating liquor — prohibition of manufacture.

1. There is no difference in constitutional principle between the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage, and the prohibition of its manufacture in order to stop the sale.

Injunction — against enforcement of Prohibition Statute — jurisdiction.

2. The court will, because of the property rights involved, and to avoid a multiplicity of suits, consider a bill to enjoin the enforcement of a general law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, where the jurisdiction of equity is not questioned.

Constitutional law — power of legislature.

3. A state Constitution is merely a limit of power, and the legislature may pass any law which is not in violation of the limitation of the state or Federal Constitution.

Courts — power over legislation.

4. The court has no power to control legislative authority other than the limitations expressed in the Constitution, even though it is repugnant to general principles of justice, liberty, and right.

Constitutional law — prohibition of liquor traffic — destruction of property.

5. The prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, being for the protection of the health, morals, and welfare of the people, is not, although the business was previously recognized property, within the constitutional provision against taking property without compensation.

— police power — liquor traffic.

6. The liquor traffic is within the police power of the state.

(— Ind. —, 120 N. E. 19.)

— protection of contract rights.

7. Charter rights, license rights, and contract rights are all subject to the inherent power of the government to protect the health, morals, and welfare of the public.

— stare decisis — police power.

8. There are no property rights which are not subject to the police power, and therefore the principle of stare decisis does not apply to decisions under such power.

9. A law cannot be declared invalid for violating the spirit of the Constitution, if it is not prohibited by express letter.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vanderburgh County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin defendant from enforcing the provisions of the Prohibition Law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Philip C. Gould, R. C. Minton, W. B. Wheeler, and Ele Stansbury, Attorney General, for appellant:

The right to sell intoxicating liquors is not one of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States forbids the states to abridge.

10. A title, "An Act Prohibiting the Manufacture, Sale, Gift, Advertisement or Transportation of Intoxicating Liquor," will cover provisions defining intoxicating liquor, prohibiting its possession, declaring places where it is kept to be nuisances, designating those who are to handle it, and providing what shall be prima facie violation of the law.

Constitutional law — class legislation — permitting sale of liquors by class.

11. A statute forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor does not become void as class legislation because the right of sale by registered pharmacists is permitted, and those who have liquor manufactured in the state are permitted to dispose of it outside of the state.

The legislative power to deal with intoxicating liquor, whether it be to license, regulate, restrain, or prohibit the sale of such liquors, is unlimited.

If a subject is within the police power of the state, the question whether the power is wisely or unwisely exercised is not a judicial one.

It is a cardinal principle of law that legislative discretion cannot be controlled by judicial decisions.

The legislature of the state has the right to determine what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, health, and safety, and unless a statute has no real substantial relation to those objects the courts cannot interfere.

Without the (constitutional) amendment the legislature would have power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Even though the enforcement of a law may operate to destroy business theretofore lawful, and does seriously impair the value of property acquired under the sanction of a special law or charter, these considerations do not render the law invalid or prevent its enforcement, when the protection of the public health or the promotion of the general welfare requires it.

If the principal subject is expressed in the title, then any number of provisions, germane to the general subject, may legitimately be embraced or embodied in the statute enacted.

Townsend, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee brewing company obtained a permanent injunction against appellant superintendent of the police of the city of Evansville, preventing the enforcement of the Prohibition Law, Acts 1917, p. 15. Appellant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled. He refused to plead further and judgment was rendered.

No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and, owing to the alleged property rights and to avoid a multiplicity of actions, the cause will be considered.

The sole question presented is the constitutionality of the act.

It is claimed that the legislature has no power, under our Constitution, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. This contention is erroneous; for it is admitted that the legislature may refer this to the people in county, township, city, or ward units and, if the majority desire, they may impose prohibition upon the minority, and it is admitted that this would be constitutional. This amounts to admitting that the majority may inflict on the minority that which is forbidden by the Constitution. This is based on the erroneous assumption that a state Constitution is a grant of power, and that when a legislature assembles something is taken from the people by it and something is left at home in the way of legislative function.

It is fundamental that a state Constitution is a limit of power. It simply divides sovereign power of the people in the state into the several departments of government, and all power inheres in the people, and they possess all of it except that which is granted to the United States in the Federal Constitution, and they may pass any law which is not in violation of the limitations in the state Constitution and not in violation of parts of the Federal Constitution applicable to the states.

If the present Constitution provided that all the people of the state should assemble once in two years, instead of the legislature, to enact laws, and all other provisions of the Constitution remained as they now are, it could not be that this body would have greater legislative power than the present legislative body. To admit this is to destroy the limitations in the Constitution and leave the minority unprotected. The very purpose of the limitations is to protect the people against themselves. The limitations are not to protect the people against the legislature alone. That protection is afforded by elections every two years. If the limitations in the Constitution are not sufficient to protect the minority against the majority, that is for the convention. The legislature is just as supreme in the legislative field as all the people would be. Both are bound by the limitations in the Constitution.

This court is bound by the same Constitution and has no right to curtail legislative authority this side of the expressed limitations in it. Nor has this court power to revolutionize the fundamental law by reading limitations into it.

This court has nothing to do with the wisdom or unwisdom of the legislative act. A law may be repugnant to general principles of justice, liberty, and rights not expressed in the Constitution, and yet the courts have no power to strike it down. State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 450, 33 L.R.A. 813, 44 N. E. 469; Praigg v. Western Paving & Supply Co. 143 Ind. 358, 363, 42 N. E. 750; Hirth-Krause Co. v. Cohen, 177 Ind. 1, 12, 97 N. E. 1, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 708. The remedy in such a case is with the people in the legislative department, or in convention, forming a new Constitution.

Mr. Cooley says: "By the Constitution which they (the people of the state) establish, they not only tie up the hands of their official agencies, but their own hands as well." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 56.

No provision of our Constitution has been pointed out which forbids the passage of laws to protect the health, morals, or welfare of the people in connection with the traffic in intoxicating liquor, even though such laws destroy previously recognized property without paying for it. That the liquor traffic is within the police power of the state no one denies.

When this is admitted, there must follow the power to take such steps as are reasonably suitable to carry out this purpose.

There is no difference in constitutional principle between the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage and the prohibition of the manufacture in order to stop the sale. The thing aimed at is the traffic in liquor as a beverage. If the people of the state, in order to stop the traffic in the beverage, deem it necessary to stop the manufacture, they have a right to do this as far as any limitations in our Constitution are concerned. When it is admitted that by local option ninety-two counties in the state may forbid absolutely the sale of intoxicating liquor without violating the provisions of the Constitution, it then follows that, in order to accomplish the same purpose, the people of the state may prohibit the manufacture. He who has a charter from the state to manufacture is deprived of his property, in part at least, when he loses the opportunity to sell in ninety-two counties of the state. From the standpoint of the constitutional limitations, there can be no difference in principle between the destruction of one dollar's worth of property and one million dollars' worth. Charter rights, license rights, contract rights are all subject to the inherent power of government to protect the health, morals, or welfare of the public. Skelton v. State, 173 Ind. 462, 468, 89 N. E. 860, 90 N. E. 897; Moore v. Indianapolis, 120 Ind. 483, 491, 22 N. E. 424; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Chappell, 183 Ind. 141, 147, 106 N. E. 403, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 627.

It is also insisted on behalf of appellee herein that it has been decided by this court that there is no power to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquor under our Constitution, and that the case of Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391, and a few cases following, settle that question. It cannot be determined by those cases on what principle the court was acting. The question stood undecided for three years, and then the law was pronounced void without assigning any reasons as to whether it was considered void under the state Constitution or Federal Constitution. That law in some of its particulars would have been void at that time under the Federal Constitution, but since then there have been passed by the Federal Congress the Wilson Act and the Webb-Kenyon Act (26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, 37 Stat. at L. 699, chap. 90, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 8738, 8739, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 585, 593), both of which have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865; Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co. 242 U. S. 311, 61 L. ed. 326, L.R.A.1917B, 1218, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 845. That law also provided for official agencies to dispense liquor, thus creating a monopoly on the part of the state in the traffic, and it may have been considered void for that reason. But since that time public monopolies have been justified in the control of intoxicating liquor, upon the ground that the nature of the traffic warrants its entire prohibition. See 15 R. C. L. pp. 267, 268, and authorities there cited.

The principle of stare decisis, if it existed, has no application to the police power because there can be no property rights which are not subject to this power. In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Chappell, 183 Ind. 141, at 146, 106 N. E. 405, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 627, this court said: "A long and firmly settled principle of law which has grown out of a well-ordered civil society is that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall neither encroach injuriously on equal enjoyment of their property by others who have an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor be injurious to the community. The law is also so fixedly settled as to be beyond controversy that rights and privileges arising from contracts with a state are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the general safety of persons and property, in the same sense as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by private persons or by corporations. Laws carrying these principles into effect in particular instances are but a proper exercise of the police power by the legislature, and are not to be hindered or overthrown by the constitutional limitations named as is claimed by counsel. Indeed, the legislature cannot contract away its police power,—the power to legislate for the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens of the state."

And in the case of King v. Inland Steel Co. 177 Ind. 201, 212, 96 N. E. 337, 97 N. E. 529, this court said: "The rule of stare decisis, which counsel invoked to induce us to adhere to those decisions, cannot chain us to error. That may be so when decisions have become a rule of property, but not in decisions involving a subject-matter such as here affected."

If this were not so, mistaken decisions would destroy that very power of society to protect itself, and a new Constitution would be created by the courts. Courts cannot decide away that which the state cannot contract away. Courts cannot make a new fundamental law by erroneously reading limitations into the Constitution not therein expressed. The principle of stare decisis is a rule of property, the use of which does not affect the public welfare. It cannot be invoked to shut off police power. State ex rel. George v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L.R.A. 345, 20 S. E. 221.

There is no spirit pervading the Constitution outside of the expressed limitations in it which enables this court to declare a law void. In the case of Logansport v. Seybold, 59 Ind. 225, of spirit.

—violation

Judge Perkins, speaking for the court at page 227, quotes from Churchman v. Martin, 54 Ind. 380, as follows: "By the Constitution of the state the legislative authority is vested in the general assembly. Const. art. 4, § 1; 1 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 27. When, therefore, an act of the general assembly is passed, which violates no provision of the Federal or state Constitution, the judicial department cannot hold it to be void on the ground that it is wrong, or unjust, or violates the spirit of our institutions." Welling v. Merrill, 52 Ind. 350; Horning v. Wendell, 57 Ind. 171; Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 634, 37 L.R.A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477, 47 N. E. 19; Forsythe v. Hammond (C. C.) 68 Fed. 774, 777.

Counsel for the appellee neither in their briefs nor in oral argument quote language from any decision of this court showing what particular provision of the Constitution forbids the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. The whole trend of the decisions in this state on the Remonstrance Laws, License Laws, and the Local Option Laws shows that no such thing ever entered the mind of this court from the time of the Beebe Case and the cases immediately following it to the present time. But on the contrary, this court has repeatedly said the subject of the control of intoxicating liquor is entirely within the power of the people, through the legislature, to do anything that they deem necessary, not only to prohibit the sale, but, in order to effectuate that purpose, to even prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquor within the state. In Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71, at page 77, 9 L.R.A. 664, 25 N. E. 885, this court said: "All laws regulating and imposing burdens on the business are prohibitory in their character. There is no difference between an absolute prohibitory law, a law providing for local option, and license law, except in the extent to which they prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks. An absolute prohibitory law deprives all within its reach from engaging in the business; a local option law prohibits all within a given locality from selling within that locality; while a license law prohibits all within the state, who have not obtained a license, from engaging in the business of retailing intoxicating liquors. Each of these is a restriction upon the common-law right of the individual citizen."

In the case of State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, at 469, 33 L.R.A. 313, 44 N. E. 478, this court used the following language: "Acting upon the just assumption that the unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors results in much evil, and that it is detrimental to society, the law-making power of each state in the Union has, in the exercise of its police power, assumed to control, regulate, or prohibit the business, as seemed to it best."

And in the same case (145 Ind. at page 468), the court says: "All laws which regulate or restrict the sale of such liquors, by imposing burdens or conditions upon the business, are in their nature or character to an extent, at least, prohibitory."

And in the case of Sopher v. State, 169 Ind. 177, at 194, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 81 N. E. 919, 14 Ann. Cas. 27, this court said: "The right to pursue such vocation was not of such an inherent or inalienable nature as to place the business beyond the control of the legislative department. The latter might, in the exercise of its discretion, under the police power, in the interest of society and the public in general, either suppress or prohibit the traffic entirely, or permit it to exist under such necessary restrictions, regulations, and burdens as might be deemed proper to impose in order to mitigate or minimize the evils resulting from the traffic, and, as against the validity of such laws enacted by the legislature, the liquor dealer was not in a position to assert any inherent or inalienable right to the contrary."

See also to the same effect, Schmidt v. Indianapolis, 168 Ind. 631, 638, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787, 120 Am. St. Rep. 385, 80 N. E. 632; Jordan v. Evansville, 163 Ind. 512, 517, 67 L.R.A. 613, 72 N. E. 544, 2 Ann. Cas. 96; Greencastle v. Thompson, 168 Ind. 493, 501, 81 N. E. 497; Delphi v. Hamling, 172 Ind. 645, 651, 89 N. E. 308.

It is also contended by the appellee that there must be a limitation in the Constitution against complete prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, because it was proposed in the constitutional convention and rejected. This question has been brought to the attention of this court before and the history of that subject reviewed. The committee to which this question was referred in December, 1850, reported to the convention as follows: "The committee of the legislative departments, to whom were referred some sundry petitions and resolutions on the subject of the sale of ardent spirits, have had that subject under consideration and have appeared here to report that your committee deem it inexpedient to make any constitutional provision on this subject, as it more particularly belongs to the legislature. They therefore ask to be discharged."

And this court, after reviewing this history, in the case of Sopher v. State, 169 Ind. 177, at page 192, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 172, 81 N. E. 918, 14 Ann. Cas. 27, says: "By these deliberative acts of the convention which formed and molded our present Constitution, that body appears to have left the question in regard to the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the hands of the legislative department, where the convention found it at the time it convened."

The power of the states, under their constitutions and under the Federal Constitution, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor and to provide such means for the enforcement of prohibition as seems expedient to the legislature, is now so well settled that it is no longer an open question. Re Crane, 27 Idaho, 671, L.R.A.1918A, 942, 151 Pac. 1006; Crane v. Campbell, 245 U. S. 304, 62 L. ed. 304, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 98, (see authorities there cited); State v. Fabbri, 98 Wash. 207, L.R.A.1918A, 416, 167 Pac. 133; State v. Durein, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 908, and note (70 Kan. 1, 78 Pac. 152); Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; *Crowley v. S. 311, 61 L. ed. 326, L.R.A.1917B, 1218, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 845.

In the light of these authorities and the decisions of this court which we have heretofore set out, we hold that this act violates no provision of the state or Federal Constitution by prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor.

It is also contended that the title is insufficient, and that the act is not consistent with the title. The title is as follows: "An Act Prohibiting the Manufacture, Sale, Gift, Advertisement or Transportation of Intoxicating Liquor Except for Certain Purposes and under Certain Conditions."

The provision of our Constitution is that every act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title. This provision is to prevent tricking the legislature into passing acts foreign to the one under consideration by it. Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 29.

It will be seen by the authorities which we have heretofore set out that to prohibit the traffic the legislature may define as an intoxicant that which is far from intoxicating, in order to prevent the manufacture and sale of that which is intoxicating; that it may prevent the possession of liquor; that it may provide that the place where liquor is kept or manufactured may be declared a nuisance and closed; that it may designate those who are to handle and dispense liquor, and upon what terms; that it may forbid advertisements of liquor; that it may provide what shall make a prima facie case of violation of the law. All of sufficiency.

these provisions are properly connected with the purpose of the legislature to prevent the traffic in intoxicating liquor as a beverage, and are therefore within the title of the act.

It is next insisted that the act is void because it gives the right to registered pharmacists to deal in intoxicants under certain restrictions, and because those who have liquors manufactured in the state which are in bond may have possession and tax, pay, and dispose of such liquors outside of the state, and all others must get rid of the intoxicants which they have on hand within ten days of the time that the law goes into effect.

The "privileges and immunities" section of our Constitution, the "class" section, and the "general law" section, are not violated if an act is reasonably designed to protect the health, morals, or welfare of the public. State v. Wiggam, — Ind. —, 118 N. E. 684.

The legislature must classify in nearly every act which it passes to protect society. To hold that it may not would be to overthrow nearly all of the laws that are made for the public welfare. If the legislature thought that this law could be better enforced by compelling all persons to remove liquors from the state except those having liquors manufactured in the state and in bond, it had a perfect right to do so. It is not for this court to try to excel legislative wisdom on the question of expediency.

The act is valid as to all provisions brought in question. The court erred in overruling appellant's demurrer to appellee's complaint.

Judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

Myers, Ch. J., concurs in conclusion.

Spencer, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the majority of my associates that the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the state of Indiana may lawfully be prohibited under the Constitution of the state, and, in view of the importance of the question at issue, I feel impelled to state the grounds of my dissent.

As is suggested by the majority opinion, this action was instituted by appellee to restrain appellant from enforcing the so-called Prohibition Law of 1917, on the ground that said law is unconstitutional and void. Various reasons for the position taken by appellee are set out in its complaint, but those to which I direct especial attention are contained in the following allegations:

"Plaintiff further says that on the — day of March, 1894, it was duly granted a corporate charter by the state of Indiana, upon a consideration paid by the plaintiff to the state, by which said charter this plaintiff was duly authorized to do the business therein specified, in the state of Indiana and elsewhere, for a period of fifty years from and after said date as a corporation, with all the authority and powers conferred by law on corporations; that under and pursuant to the provisions of said charter this plaintiff was authorized to and did engage, and is now engaged, in Vanderburgh county, Indiana, exclusively in the business of the manufacture of beer, ale, and other liquor, and the sale thereof in barrels, kegs, bottles, and other packages throughout the United States of America and elsewhere; that, immediately after said incorporation aforesaid, this plaintiff purchased real estate in said Vanderburgh county, and improved the same by erecting thereon large and expensive buildings, and installed therein machinery at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars for the sole purpose for which this plaintiff was incorporated as aforesaid, and since said date continuously to the present time has been and now is using said property exclusively for the purposes aforesaid.

"And plaintiff further says that at the time said charter was granted as aforesaid, and continuously thereafter to the present time, the laws of the state of Indiana, as enacted and declared by the general assembly of the state and by the supreme judicial tribunals of the state, have made and do now make the business of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor a lawful business, and have extended to property used in the manufacture and sale of such liquor the same protection extended to other property, and did then recognize, and since said time continuously have recognized and protected, the owner or owners of such property in the same manner as the owners of other property. And plaintiff further says that at the time of granting said charter as aforesaid, and continuously thereafter to the present time, it has relied and acted upon the validity of said laws enacted and promulgated and in full force and effect as aforesaid, and, relying upon said laws as in force, has, during said time since its incorporation to the present time, invested in said city aforesaid more than $1,000,000 in real estate, machinery, and improvements thereon; that said machinery and improvements were made and acquired and are suitable only for the purpose for which the same were made and acquired as aforesaid, and for the sole and exclusive purpose of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, under and pursuant to the charter granted to this plaintiff as aforesaid; and that said real estate so acquired and the improvements and machinery so placed thereon are now and during said time have been owned by this plaintiff, and are now of the value of more than $1,000,000; that said improvements and machinery aforesaid are suitable only for the purpose of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and cannot be used, and are worthless, for any other purpose whatsoever; that, relying upon said laws as aforesaid and upon the said charter so granted to this plaintiff as aforesaid, this plaintiff purchased and improved said property as aforesaid; and that, if this plaintiff is deprived of the use of said property for the uses and purposes aforesaid, said property will be worthless and will be a total loss to this plaintiff. . . .

"And plaintiff further says that, at the time said charter aforesaid was granted by the state and was accepted by this plaintiff, the laws of the state as aforesaid entered into and became a part of said charter, and that said charter, when so granted and accepted, became and was and is a valid contract between this plaintiff and the state of Indiana, and plaintiff says that said defendant should be enjoined from enforcing the provisions of said Act of February 9, 1917, against this plaintiff, for the reasons that said act is in violation of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting a state from enacting a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

"And plaintiff further says that said Act of February 9, 1917, is unconstitutional and void, and should not be enforced against this plaintiff, for the reason that the Constitution of this state has not conferred upon the general assembly of this state authority to prohibit arbitrarily the use by any citizen of the state of any property which such citizen may lawfully acquire, nor has the legislature of this state been given any authority by the Constitution of this state to prohibit arbitrarily a citizen of Indiana from using property he may lawfully acquire in such manner and for such purpose as such citizen may deem best or most advantageous to himself, nor has the Constitution of this state conferred any authority, either expressly or impliedly, upon the general assembly of this state, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of any particular class or classes of personal property. . . .

"Plaintiff further says that said Act of February 9, 1917, should not be enforced against this plaintiff, and that the defendant should be enjoined and restrained from enforcing said act against this plaintiff for the reason that, if this plaintiff is prohibited from using its said property and buildings and machinery aforesaid for the purpose for which the same were constructed and acquired as aforesaid, the same will become of no value as property, and will become materially diminished in value, if not employed in the manufacture of malt liquor, for every purpose, and that the enforcement of said act by said defendant as aforesaid will be a taking of the property of this plaintiff without due process of law, in violation of constitutional provisions of this state and of the United States."

Appellant's demurrer admitted the truth of all facts pleaded in appellee's complaint, and it became the duty of the trial court, and now of this court, to determine whether the pleader's conclusions as to the law are equally well-founded. In approaching this question I am not unmindful of a growing public sentiment that the use of intoxicating liquors has been seriously abused, and that traffic therein must be more strictly regulated. I recognize, also, that in a proper case, and as an aid to interpretation alone, public sentiment, when clearly defined, may be considered by the courts in determining what legislative intention is sought to be expressed in an enactment which is responsive to that sentiment. But this doctrine has no application where the sole issue to be decided is the right of the legislature, under the Constitution, to pass the act in question. As was once said by Rufus Choate, in speaking of the duty of a judge: "He shall know nothing about the parties, everything about the case. He shall do everything for justice, nothing for himself, nothing for his friends, nothing for his patron, nothing for his party. If on the one side are the executive power and the legislature and the people, the sources of his honors, the givers of his daily bread, and, on the other, an individual nameless and odious, his eye is to see neither great nor small, attending only to the trepidations of the balance. If a law is passed by a unanimous legislature, clamored for by the general voice of the public, and a cause is before him on it, in which the whole community is on one side and an individual nameless and odious on the other, and he believes it to be against the Constitution, he must so declare it or there is no judge."

The case at bar presents squarely an issue of constitutional authority, and the decision of that issue must rest on sound principles of constitutional law. In its ultimate analysis, the decision by the majority of the court that the legislature may lawfully prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors is based on the theory that its act constitutes a proper exercise of the police power of the state. The definitions of "police power," as announced by various authors and jurists, contain some confusion and ambiguity, but, in fact, "the police power of the government, as understood in the constitutional law of the United States, is simply the power of the government to establish provisions for the enforcement of the common as well as civil law maxim, 'Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas.' "This police power of the state extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the state. According to the maxim, "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas," it being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which everyone may so use his own as not to injure others.' Any law which goes beyond that principle, which undertakes to abolish rights the exercise of which does not involve an infringement of the rights of others, or to limit the exercise of rights beyond what is necessary to provide for the public welfare and the general security, cannot be included in the police power of the government. It is a governmental usurpation, and violates the principles of abstract justice, as they have been developed under our republican institutions."

Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 4, § 1.

With this principle in mind, the above author concludes, after a careful and extended discussion of his subject, "that no trade can be subjected to police regulation of any kind, unless its prosecution involves some harm or injury to the public or to third persons, and in any case the regulation cannot extend beyond the evil which is to be restrained. It has also been maintained, and I think satisfactorily established, that no trade can be prohibited altogether, unless the evil is inherent in the character of the trade, so that the trade, however conducted, and whatever may be the character of the person engaged in it, must necessarily produce injury upon the public or upon individual third persons." Tiedeman, supra, p. 301, § 103.

When one has assented to the truth of these principles, as he must, in their application to other cases of police regulation of employments, "his inability to adhere to them in their application to the police regulation of the liquor trade indicates either a lack of courage to maintain his conviction in the face of popular clamor, or an obscurity of his judgment through his sympathetic emotions, which are aroused in considering the gigantic evil to be combated." Tiedeman, supra, p. 302.

Tested in the light of the above principles, which must serve as the basis for every proper exercise of the police power, it is apparent beyond question that the act now under consideration is invalid, at least in so far as it attempts to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the state. It is not to be doubted that the excessive use of intoxicants by the individual has contributed greatly to the increase of poverty and crime among the people, but that fact constitutes no valid objection against the right to manufacture the commodity. Physicians and scientists are equally certain that the excessive use of particular goods, especially animal flesh, is responsible to a great degree for the prevalence of physical suffering and disease (auto-intoxication), yet can the beef packer be prohibited from pursuing his trade on that account? The use and abuse of gasoline is daily exacting a heavy toll from the people of this country in motor accidents, yet no one will contend that the production of gasoline and similar substances may lawfully be prohibited. On what theory, then, is the manufacture of intoxicating liquors to be prohibited because their abuse by individuals tends to produce misery and want, when the same individual abuse of meat and gasoline may lead to equally distressing conditions without inducing lawful restraint on their manufacture? Obviously, the distinction is arbitrary, and a legislative mandate against production ought no more to be sustained in the one case than in the other.

"The police power rests upon necessity and the right of self-protection, but private property cannot be arbitrarily invaded under the mere guise of police regulation." Ch. J. Fuller, in Lawton v. Steele (1894) 152 U. S. 133, 144, 38 L. ed. 385, 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, 503.

Again, as was said by Mr. Justice Harlan, in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, a case involving the constitutionality of the Kansas law, enacted under a specific mandatory declaration in the Constitution of that state, which law was upheld: "The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution."

This court said, by Hadley, Ch. J., in Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. State (1903) 160 Ind. 379, at page 386, 62 L.R.A. 136, 66 N. E. 1007, in quoting the words of Brown, J., in Lawton v. Steele, supra: "The legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts."

And this court, speaking for itself, further said: "It follows that a statute, to be within the power, must be responsive to some public necessity, suitable to subserve it, and reasonable in its operation."

Again, this court, in State v. Richcreek (1906) 167 Ind. 217, at page 230, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874, 119 Am. St. Rep. 491, 77 N. E. 1085, 10 Ann. Cas. 899, uses this expression in substance: The exercise of the police power is subject to the supervision of the courts, and such acts may be declared void when they violate some constitutional right.

There is nothing in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors which leads directly to public harm, and no evil which inheres in the character of that trade. Indeed, the beneficent uses of such liquors are recognized in the very act now under consideration, and this recognition, in itself, serves to overcome the only ground on which the prohibition of their manufacture can be sustained, viz.: "That the trade, however conducted, and whatever may be the character of the person engaged in it, must necessarily produce injury upon the public or upon individual third persons."

Section 5 of the act, among others, recognizes the right of an individual to have and to use intoxicants in his own home, and authorizes a registered pharmacist to sell intoxicating liquors for medicinal and sacramental purposes, thereby declaring, in effect, that there is a proper use for such liquors. This declaration and admission is necessarily destructive of the assumed power to prohibit their manufacture, for the right to engage in a proper business is a natural right which is entitled to constitutional protection. The assured right of possession and use on the part of the citizen necessarily implies the existence of an adequate lawful means of obtaining it and a proper source of supply, yet the act prohibits all citizens of Indiana from engaging in the production of that supply. This constitutes a discrimination in favor of citizens of other states, and is, in itself, sufficient to condemn the law. Furthermore, it appears from appellee's complaint, and appellant's demurrer admits the truth of the averment, that its business as a manufacturer of intoxicating liquors is not confined to the state of Indiana, but extends "throughout the United States of America and elsewhere." On what possible theory can appellee be legally deprived of the right to manufacture its products in Indiana for shipment to territory where their sale is not prohibited? Certainly that business would have no reasonable relation to or effect on the health, morals, or general welfare of the people of this state, and its prohibition cannot be justified on any legal ground.

Many other objections against the validity of this act as a proper exercise of the police power may be suggested, but the points above made cannot, in reason, be successfully controverted. I know that numerous cases may be found which seem to recognize a power in the states to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as tending to promote the general welfare of the people, but on an examination of such cases, most of which are collected in the majority opinion, it will be found, either that they rest on constitutional provisions which differ from our own, or that the holding of the court in the particular instance is as arbitrary and lacking in basic reason as is the law which it sustains.

In brief, I subscribe fully to the conclusion reached by Mr. Tiedeman, after a careful consideration of all the constitutional reasons for and against the prohibition of the liquor trade, that "the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors is unconstitutional, unless it is confined to the prohibition of drinking saloons, and the prohibition of the sale of liquor to minors, lunatics, confirmed drunkards, and persons in a state of intoxication. As has already been explained, there is an almost unbroken array of judicial opinions against this position, and there is not any reasonable likelihood that there will be any immediate revulsion in the opinions of the courts. But it is the duty of a constitutional jurist to press his views of constitutional law upon the attention of the legal world, even though they place him in opposition to the current of authority." Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 311, § 103.

Tested solely by established principles of constitutional law, the absolute prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors is not a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and, on any other theory, legislation looking to that end must constitute a taking of private property without due process of law. 14th Amendment Const. United States.

The above conclusions, to which reason and logic unerringly lead, are sufficient to require an affirmance of the decision in this case, but there is an additional ground on which the decision of the trial court ought to be upheld. The majority opinion, which is solely a "case law" opinion, refers briefly to the case of Beebe v. State (1855) 6 Ind. 501, 68 Am. Dec. 391, and the decision subsequent thereto, and says: "It cannot be determined by those cases on what principle the court was acting. The question stood undecided for three years, and then the law was pronounced void without assigning any reasons as to whether it was considered void under the state Constitution or Federal Constitution."

I am unable to understand that statement. This court, in the Beebe Case, by a vote of three to one, expressly held that the Law of 1855, then under consideration, was void in so far as it undertook to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the state. Judge Perkins, with Judge Davison concurring, held that the act was to that extent violative of various sections of the Bill of Rights as set forth in the Constitution of Indiana, and particularly the provision in § 21 that "no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation." Judge Stuart expressly agreed with the conclusion that it was unconstitutional to prohibit the manufacture of liquor, although not assigning his reasons therefor, while Judge Gookins alone dissented on that proposition. It is true, as was later stated by Judge Perkins, in the case of Ingersoll v. State (1859) 11 Ind. 464, that those sections of the act which sought to prohibit the retail of intoxicating liquors were not judicially annulled until nearly three years had elapsed from the time of its going into effect, but the decision that the legislature, under the present Constitution of the state, has no power to enact a law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, was clearly defined, and has stood unchallenged to the present time. That decision was necessarily binding on the trial court in this case as the latest expression of the supreme judicial tribunal of the state on the issues involved, and it should be equally controlling in this appeal for either of two reasons. In the first place, it is sound in principle and therefore to be followed without question, but, if conceded to be erroneous as an original holding, it must now serve as the basis for a just application of the rule of stare decisis. The prevailing opinion holds that the latter rule "cannot be invoked to shut off police power;" but, for reasons heretofore stated, I do not agree that its invocation in the present case would have that effect. Appellee's complaint alleges, and appellant's demurrer admits, that large sums of money have been invested and valuable property rights acquired on the strength of the charter contract granted by the state to appellee and on the rule theretofore announced in the decisions of this court that the legislature could not take from appellee, without fault on its part, the right to do business under that charter. The decision in Beebe v. State, supra, at least to the extent that it holds the legislature to be without such power, has become a rule of property in Indiana, and the rights acquired by appellee on the faith of that rule must be protected under the doctrine of stare decisis, if on no other ground. Moore-Mansfield Constr. Co. v. Indianapolis N. & T. R. Co. (1913) 179 Ind. 356, 391, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816, 101 N. E. 296, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 917; Pond v. Irwin (1888) 113 Ind. 243, 247, 15 N. E. 272; Frank v. Evansville & I. R. Co. (1887) 111 Ind. 132, 136, 12 N. E. 105; Diamond Plate Glass Co. v. Knot (1906) 38 Ind. App. 20, 25, 77 N. E. 954.

The decision of the Vanderburgh superior court should be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

The question as to the power of the state to regulate and control the sale of intoxicating liquors has been the source of much litigation, which has resulted in fully sustaining the power of the state in this regard. The reported case (SCHMITT v. F. W. COOK BREWING Co. ante, 270) goes a step further, and sustains the power not only to prohibit absolutely the sale of intoxicating liquors, but also the manufacture of such liquors within the state. As hereinafter pointed out, however, the power of the state in this regard is fully sustained by cases, either passing upon the specific question or related questions.

A note showing the attitude of the courts on this question may not be inopportune, in view of the widespread agitation to test anew the validity and wisdom of the whole body of law relating to the liquor traffic, notwithstanding the recent amendment to the Federal Constitution.

As pointed out, on account of their noxious qualities and the extraordinary evils shown by experience commonly to be consequent upon their use, the state, through the exercise of its police power, has the authority absolutely to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within its borders; and prohibitory laws of this character are not violative of the Federal Constitution or the usual state constitutions. This rule is expressly sustained or recognized in the following cases:

Although a prohibitory law may operate to depreciate the principal value of property used for the purpose of brewing or manufacturing intoxicating liquors, it does not amount to the taking of property without compensation, within the purview of constitutional provisions against the taking of property without compensation. Mugler v. Kansas (1887) 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278; Cantini v. Tillman (1893) 54 Fed. 969; Busch v. Webb (1903) 122 Fed. 655, appeal dismissed in (1904) 194 U. S. 640, 48 L. ed. 1162, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857.

In this connection, it has been pointed out that if the public safety or morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hand of the legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience individuals or corporations may suffer, for all rights are held subject to the police power of the state, and the legislature cannot by contract divest itself of the right to exercise this power. Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts (1877) 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989.

Nor does a prohibitory law of this character constitute such an interference with interstate commerce as to render it void on that ground. Kidd v. Pearson (1888) 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Delaney v. Plunkett (1917) 146 Ga. 547, L.R.A.1917D, 926, 91 S. E. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 685.

In Beebe v. State (1855) 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391, it was apparently held that the state is without power to prohibit the manufacture of whisky, ale, porter, and beer, as beverages. There is, however, some question as to the real holding in this case, and, as shown in the reported case (SCHMITT v. F. W. COOK BREWING CO.) such a prohibitory law would now be held constitutional.

In State v. Walruff (1886) 26 Fed. 178, it was held that a state may prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquor if the law is made applicable to manufacturers who thereafter engage in that business, but it cannot make the law applicable to those then engaged in the business, since to do so would amount to the taking of property without compensation. This holding is apparently in conflict with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court heretofore cited.

In United States v. James (1918) 256 Fed. 102, it is also held that a state possesses the power absolutely to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. It is further held that delegation to qualified voters of a county, or a subdivision thereof, of the right to determine the question of prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors within its limits, does not confer upon them the right also to determine whether the manufacture of liquor shall be prohibited in its limits. The court reasoned that nowhere does the word manufacture appear, "and an affirmative answer to the question can only be given if it be held that the power to prohibit the sale necessarily involved the power to prohibit or authorize the manufacture. Apart from the principle of statutory construction, already adverted to, that every intendment must be indulged in favor of legislative power, common sense and common experience unite in declaring that not only is the power to prohibit the manufacture not a necessary content of the power to prohibit the sale, but that the two subjects are independent of each other, and so wholly distinct and separate in their physical incidents and character as that not even the most strained construction could extend the word 'sale' to include or embrace the word 'manufacture.'" APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, modifying and affirming an interlocutory decree of a Special Term, Part III., for New York County in plaintiff's favor, in an action for an accounting for money and property received by defendant's testator under a certain factor's contract. Modified.

The facts, so far as material, are stated in the opinion of the court.

The questions certified were as follows:

1. Is the defendant under the contract, plaintiff's Exhibit 1, entitled to charge interest compounded monthly at the rate of 6 per cent on all monthly debit balances due from the plaintiff to the defendant?

2. Did the accounts current, plaintiff's Exhibit 22, rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff, become accounts stated and settled, and is the plaintiff precluded under the pleadings and findings from objecting on the accounting to the items in said accounts which are in derogation of the contract?

3. Has the defendant a right under the contract, plaintiff's Exhibit

1, to charge the plaintiff 9½ per cent commission on the sale of the consigned goods after the first $100,000 of sales had been made?

4. Is the defendant only entitled to charge a commission of 5 per cent on all sales over and above $100,000, to be computed on the net amount of sales of the consigned goods during the lifetime of the contract?

5. Has the defendant the right to charge the plaintiff with the fees of attorneys and detectives employed by him for his own protection in a controversy arising in and about the severance of the relations between them, under the contract, plaintiff's Exhibit 1, and in the protection, as against the plaintiff, of defendant's lien and interest in the security which he claimed to hold?

Messrs. Julius Henry Cohen and Theodore B. Richter, for appellants:

The accounts current rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff, and retained by it without objection, constituted accounts stated, and are no longer subject to attack or review.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is one for an accounting by a principal against a factor. The plaintiff agreed to consign to the defendant its goods then owned, and also all goods acquired during the term of the agreement. The defendant was to sell them, and was to collect the accounts. He agreed to make advances on demand up to 50 per cent of the net cost of the merchandise and 75 per cent of the net value of outstanding accounts. He was to receive for his services "9½ per cent commission on the first $100,000 of sales," and 5 per cent on all sales above that amount. Interest was to be "charged on the account current . . . at the rate of 6 per cent per annum." The agreement was dated June 21, 1909, but business was not begun under it till September 1, 1909. It was to continue from its date "to and including September 1, 1910, and thereafter subject to termination at any time upon thirty days' written notice given by either of said parties to the other." The plaintiff gave notice of termination on September 29, 1911.

During this period of their dealings the defendant sent the plaintiff monthly accounts current. The first account was rendered on October 1, 1909, and the last on September 1, 1911. The trial judge found that the plaintiff retained them; that it made no objection to any of them till October, 1911; that they were untainted by fraud; and that plaintiff read and understood them. He refused, however, to find that they were "intended by the defendant and understood by the plaintiff as complete statements of the account between the parties for the period covered thereby." In these statements the plaintiff is charged with the defendant's advances, his disbursements, and his commissions. It is credited with his collections, which are not itemized. To explain the computation of commissions, there is appended a schedule of "sales as reported." This schedule gives the total sales for each day. It does not give the items and does not name the purchasers. The debit balance in each statement includes interest on advances and on other charges. The balance thus reached is carried forward into the next following statement, and bears interest again. Interest is thus compounded monthly. During the first year of business commissions are charged on the first $100,000 of sales at the rate of 9½ per cent, and thereafter at the rate of 5 per cent. During the second year, beginning September 1, 1910, this process is repeated. The trial court and the appellate division held that the charge of compound interest was unlawful. They held also that commissions at the rate of 9½ per cent were due on $100,000 of sales during the first year, and not on $100,000 in each year. Those are the chief items in dispute. Some minor items of disbursement will be referred to later.

1. The charge of compound interest was correctly disallowed. The rule is settled that a promise to pay interest upon interest is void if made at a time before simple interest has accrued. Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162, 23 Am. Rep. 99. The provision in the contract, that interest shall be "charged on the account current . . . at the rate of 6 per cent per annum," must, therefore, mean simple interest.

—promise to pay—
consideration.

Any other promise, made at the outset of the dealings, would be invalid. There are times, however, when a promise to pay compound interest will be enforced, if made after simple interest has accrued; and the promise may be the implied one that results from the statement of an account. Even in such cases, there must be forbearance or other consideration to make the promise good. Young v. Hill, supra. There was no promise here unless the retention of the accounts current establish an account stated.

The trial court held that it did not, and we find no error in the ruling. There is no doubt that an account stated may sometimes result from the retention of accounts current without objection. Knickerbocker v. Gould, 115 N. Y. 533, 537, 22 N. E. 573; Spellman v. Muehlfeld, 166 N. Y. 245, 59 N. E. 817. But the result does not always follow. It varies with the circumstances that surround the submission of the statements (Harvey v. West Side Elev. (Patented) R. Co. 13 Hun, 392; Eames Vacuum Brake Co. v. Prosser, 157 N. Y. 289, 300, 51 N. E. 986); and those circumstances include, of course, the relation between the parties. Here the relation was that of principal and factor under an agreement that was to last at least a year, and indefinitely thereafter unless terminated by notice of thirty days. Not till the contract was at an end did the duty to make advances cease. Not till then did the right to recover past advances accrue. Indeed, it is doubtful whether even then there was any personal liability until the security had been exhausted by the enforcement of the lien. The rule in this state is that, in the absence of some agreement to the contrary, the consigned goods are the primary fund advances—fund for

to which the factor must look for reimbursement. Gihon v. Stanton, 9 N. Y. 476; Hidden v. Waldo, 55 N. Y. 294, 297; Re Atwood, 3 App. Div. 578, 581, 38 N. Y. Supp. 338. The same rule prevails in other jurisdictions. Joseph P. Murphy Co's Estate, 214 Pa. 258, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1147, 63 Atl. 745, 6 Ann. Cas. 308; Balderston v. National Rubber Co. 18 R. I. 338, 49 Am. St. Rep. 772, 27 Atl. 507; Frothingham v. Everton, 12 N. H. 239; Kraft v. Fancher, 44 Md. 204, contra, Beckwith v. Sibley, 11 Pick. 482; Dolan v. Thompson, 126 Mass. 183. We do not need to determine whether any provisions of this contract have varied the general rule. If they have, they have done it so doubtfully and obscurely that the consignor might not unreasonably act upon a contrary assumption. In any event it knew, whether the goods were the primary fund for reimbursement or not, that the consignee's duty to advance was a continuing one while the contract remained in force. The debit balances shown by these monthly statements did not, therefore, constitute a present debt.

Account stated—
and factor.

They did not speak the language of present demand for payment or adjustment. They were like the statements rendered by one partner to another which were considered in Hughes v. Smither, 23 App. Div. 590, 594, 49 N. Y. Supp. 115, affirmed on opinion below in 163 N. Y. 553, 57 N. E. 1112. The implication was that they were "offered merely as a basis for subsequent liquidation." Hughes v. Smither, supra. They were provisional advances. They were not definitive demands.

We do not suggest a doubt that there are times and occasions when an account stated may arise between principal and factor. Dows —between v. Durfee, 10 Barb.

 principal and 218, 215. It will factor. arise, for example, at the close of their dealings when balances are adjusted and payments made. It will arise while dealings continue if the intent to settle the accounts is found, and the inference will be drawn the more readily where the relation between the parties is terminable at will. But the very meaning of an account stated is that the parties have come to-—definition. together and agreed upon the balance of indebtedness, in simul compu-tassent, so that an action to recover the balance as upon an implied promise of payment may thenceforth be maintained. Volkening v. De Graaf, 81 N. Y. 268, 271. In this case, the implication of a promise of payment has been rebutted. We have pointed out that the balance ultimately due was still unliquidated when the monthly statements were received. To this we add that the statements were indefinite and general, and left the plaintiff ignorant of items and of names. In such circumstances, we cannot say, and least of all as a matter of law, that the retention of the advices without objection was a statement of the account. The trial judge refused to find that a settlement was intended. His ruling has support in the evidence, and is conclusive in this court.

2. Commissions at the rate of 9½ per cent were properly restricted to sales during the first year. If the parties intended to make a fresh start each year, they certainly did not say so. In the words of Scott, J., writing at the appellate division,
 there was not "a contract for a year with annual renewals, but a single contract running

Factor-commission-amount. for one year at all events, and thereafter continuing until terminated by a notice from one of the parties to the other." We do not need to determine whether there is enough ambiguity in the language of the contract to permit its apparent meaning to be varied through the statement of accounts. We have seen that there were no statements of account; and hence the apparent meaning is controlling. The silent retention of the accounts current, if it had any force at all, was at the utmost a mere admission. It did not override the contract.

3. Toward the close of the dealings the defendant was informed that the plaintiff was secretly removing merchandise so as to escape the defendant's lien. The defendant thereupon employed counsel and detectives. The trial court found that expenses thereby incurred were proper charges against the consigned goods. The appellate division held the contrary. It found, however,—“that the situation disclosed to the defendant . . . was such as to lead him, in the exercise of due diligence and reasonable precaution, to take the steps aforesaid for the protection of his rights and interests, and that the defendant in taking such steps acted in good faith.” It found also that the expenses were occasioned by “the aforesaid acts of the plaintiff in surreptitiously removing merchandise and in directing the concealment of merchandise.”

We think the plaintiff is chargeable with expenses thus incurred.
 The contract says that the defendant shall have a —lien for lien not only for all counsel and advances, but also detective fees.
 for all “his expenses and his said commissions, and all outlays of every sort, including all legal expenses and reasonable counsel fees and for all liabilities which shall be made or incurred by James Talcott in connection with the said business, or by reason of any act done or omitted by Greene-Newburger Company” (the plaintiff's predecessor). If a stranger had converted or threatened to convert the goods, the consignee would have been entitled to reimbursement for detective and counsel fees incurred in the effort to get them back. We think his rights are no different when the conversion has been threatened by the consignor. In each case the consignee is acting to protect and preserve his lien.

The order should be modified in accordance with this opinion. The first, second, and third questions should be answered in the negative, and the fourth and fifth questions in the affirmative. No costs of this appeal are allowed to either party.

ANNOTATION.

Account stated as between principal and factor.

The earlier view of the rule that the rendition of an account and its retention by the party to whom sent, without objection within a reasonable time, give it the force and effect of an account stated, was that it was applicable to merchants only; but modern usage regards it as applicable to all classes of business men. It has been treated as applicable as between a factor or commission merchant and his principal in

In such cases, however, it must always be understood that the account truly and honestly represents the actings of the factor. Smedley v. Williams (1849) 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 359.

And where the one rendering the account knows that he has included items against the other that he had no right, under the contract, to include, the retention of the account does not make it an account stated or create an estoppel. Blanck v. Pioneer Min. Co. (1916) 93 Wash. 26, 159 Pac. 1077.

An account rendered which does not pretend to be a final adjustment and settlement of the transaction between the parties, but which is simply for the purpose of giving information, will not become an account stated by mere failure to object to it. See Glasscock v. Rosengrant (1892) 55 Ark. 376, 18 S. W. 379; Harrison v. Henderson (1903) 67 Kan. 202, 72 Pac. 878; Lockwood v. Thorne (1858) 18 N. Y. 286; Harvey v. West Side Elev. (Patented) R. Co. (1878) 13 Hun (N. Y.) 392.

The principle that an account rendered will be deemed an account stated from the presumed approbation or acquiescence of the parties, unless an objection is made thereto within a reasonable time, cannot be applied where the only evidence as to the rendition of an account was to the effect that an account current was transmitted by the factor to his principal from time to time, it not appearing that in such account a balance was struck, and that the business and correspondence of the parties had subsequently proceeded as before without objection. Freeman v. Howell (1849) 4 La. Ann. 196, 50 Am. Dec. 561.

A principal who received the account current of his factors in February, and retained it without objection until the time his bill for an accounting was exhibited in January of the following year, must be deemed impliedly to have admitted the correctness of the account, although such admission will not operate so conclusively against him as to prevent him from surcharging and falsifying. Langdon v. Roane (1844) 6 Ala. 518, 41 Am. Dec. 60.

Where the parties lived in the same city and were in the habit of almost daily intercourse, the retention of the account for upwards of five weeks without objection, coupled with the fact of the principal's dealing with the factor upon the old footing, estops him from going into the question whether the sales had or had not been made at an inadequate price. Smedley v. Williams (1849) 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 359.

So, where a commission merchant rendered an account of sale to his consignor, who drew upon him for proceeds, the silence of the consignor for more than six months thereafter raised a legal presumption of his assent. Hall v. Sloan (1873) 9 Phila. (Pa.) 138.

In Allen-West Commission Co. v. Patillo (1898) 33 C. C. A. 194, 61 U. S. App. 94, 90 Fed. 628, it was held that a failure for two years to object to a statement of account rendered by a factor, which included a charge for commissions on property not shipped to him, but on which he claimed commissions under his contract, rendered the account a stated one.

An account of sales, rendered by a factor to his principal from time to time, and containing items of charges for storage and insurance to which no objection was made until the commencement of the suit, may be regarded as prima facie evidence of the correctness of the account. Bailey v. Bensley (1877) 87 Ill. 556.

The principal cannot object to charges of interest on the balances carried forward from preceding statements of account. Allen v. Nettles (1887) 39 La. Ann. 788, 2 So. 602; Flower v. O'Bannon (1891) 43 La. Ann. 1042, 10 So. 376.

If the principal has accepted without objection statements of account from his factor in which the gross price received on sales was not stated, but merely the net price after deducting charges for cartage, demurrage claims by the railroad company, and commission, he is bound by them if they were in fact correct, and cannot complain that by reason of the statements of the account in this way the factor should be deprived of his commission. Everingham v. Halsey (1899) 108 Iowa, 709, 78 N. W. 220.

Circumstances tending to rebut presumption of acquiescence.

To give an account rendered the force of an account stated because of silence on the part of the person receiving it, the circumstances must be such as to justify an inference of assent on his part to its correctness.

In determining whether the retention of an account rendered by a factor amounts to an implied admission of and acquiescence in its correctness, the circumstances attending the previous dealings between the parties, tending to show their feelings and relations with each other, must be taken into consideration. Wittkowski v. Harris (1894) 64 Fed. 712.

Where a factor transmitted to his principal accounts of two different sales of the same goods, the principal, after having approved the first, was not bound to notice or object to the second at the peril of its being taken as a stated account and held to be binding upon him. Cartwright v. Greene (1866) 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 9.

The rule that a failure to object to an account rendered will give it the effect of an account stated is inapplicable as between parties to an executory contract, and to the mutual accounts rendered by one party to the other. Dodge v. Brown (1914) 74 W. Va. 466, 82 S. E. 262.

Where the factor holds title to and asserts a lien upon the principal's goods, so that the principal could not, during the term of their contract, enforce his objection to the compounding of interest on monthly balances without the risk of wrecking his business, his retention of subsequent monthly statements rendered by the factor in which interest is compounded does not preclude him from subsequently contesting the factor's right to do so. Spain v. Talcott (1915) 165 App. Div. 815, 152 N. Y. Supp. 611.

Statement by Gilbert, J.:

The Trust Company of Georgia, as executor of the will of Thomas Egleston, deceased, filed a petition for construction of the will, and for general direction. William Egleston filed his intervention. A codicil to the will contained, among other provisions, the following: "And that any person not named for bequests by being overlooked by me, and who the executors feel was an oversight, be provided for liberally, and before provision is made for any charitable object." The judge of the superior court in his decree held that this provision is "too indefinite to be effectual, and is incapable of being carried out by the executor and the advisory trustees, or either of them, and is therefore void and of no effect." This ruling is excepted to upon the ground that it is contrary to law; and also, among other grounds, because "said provision is a valid and binding testamentary disposition; and upon the ground that said provision is not too indefinite to be effectual; and upon the ground that said provision does not lack certainty; and, further, upon the ground that it is not so broad and far-reaching in its scope as to endanger the carrying out of the general scheme of the testator's will, and being inconsisent with its real intention; and because it is not incapable of being executed on the ground that the executor and advisory trustees cannot ascertain whether a person was overlooked by the testator, or whether the failure to provide for a person was an oversight."

Messrs. Moise & Riddell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Anderson & Rountree, King & Spalding, H. A. Alexander, C. H. Cohen, and R. S. Cohen for defendant in error.

Gilbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The validity of the foregoing excerpts from the codicil depends upon whether the executor and advisory trustees can determine (1) what "persons" were "overlooked;" (2) whom the executors felt were thus "overlooked" by "oversight;" and (3) what would be a liberal provision for such persons. Without attempting to analyze, reconcile, or explain the almost endless views upon the question involved, to be found in decisions and other authorities, we are of the opinion that the provision of the codicil is unenforceable, because it is too indefinite and too uncertain. The proposed bequest is not limited to friends or relatives, or to any class of "persons." It might be possible to determine what would be a liberal provision, in the light of the value of the entire estate and the bequests already made certain, provided an intelligent and reasonably accurate limit could be fixed to the number of beneficiaries entitled to take under the provision. But we do not see how it could be determined that any particular person not named for a bequest in the will was "overlooked" by the testator, due to "oversight." The mere fact of relationship or friendship, together with a failure to receive mention in the will, does not necessarily imply an "oversight." Every will is so much a thing of itself, and, generally, so unlike other wills, that it must be construed by itself as containing its own law. Olmstead v. Dunn, 72 Ga. 850. This is especially true of the will now under consideration. The intention of the testator, ascertained from the words of the will, under the law existing at the time it takes effect, and subject thereto, is the paramount guide; but where that intention is expressed in terms too indefinite and uncertain to permit enforcement, it amounts to no expression of intention. The intention of this testator as to other dispositions of his property was clearly and unmistakably expressed in the will; and the courts should adhere to that which is without doubt, rather than wander into the dangerous and doubtful paths of uncertainty. In the case of Minot v. Atty. Gen. 189 Mass. 176, 75 N. E. 149, the court had under consideration the terms of a will where the testator bequeathed a part of his estate to "any of testator's relatives, whom 'without reason' he might have overlooked, such sum as might seem to . . . his executors, under all the circumstances, fitting, suitable, and proper." This provision was held void for uncertainty and indefiniteness. In the opinion the court said: "When an attempt is made to define the class of relatives intended, there is nothing disclosed by any extrinsic facts from which it can be determined that any of the testator's relatives whom he may have omitted were unintentionally overlooked. If construed to mean relatives whom he may have forgotten, we are no nearer a definition; for there is no standard provided by him by which to ascertain how far he may have remembered and purposely omitted them, or, without such an intention, failed to recall them when making a testamentary disposition of his property. Before any distribution could be made, the executors or the court would be called upon to decide, and must determine, not who were the testator's relatives at the time of his death, but what members of this class had been forgotten by him. Manifestly this would be a practical impossibility." In that case the bequest was limited to relatives. Otherwise the case is very similar to this case.

The trial court did not err in adjudging that the provisions of the codicil in question were void and of no effect.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of provision in will vesting discretion in executor or third person as to objects of testator's bounty.

I. Introductory, 297.

II. Provision held invalid, 297.

III. Provision held valid, 299.

1. Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to present the decision involving the question whether a testamentary provision, whereby the testator gives to his executor or to a third person discretionary power to select the person or persons who shall receive his bounty, is valid. It excludes all cases dealing with testamentary provisions for the creation of charitable, educational, religious, or precatory trusts, except where such a provision is intermingled with one within the scope of this note. It also excludes all cases dealing with a general devise or bequest in trust to be distributed as the trustee may see fit or think proper, and all cases dealing with the creation of a power of appointment.

II. Provision held invalid.

It is an elementary rule that to create a valid testamentary gift or trust, the instrument should clearly show the person or persons to whom it is to be applied, and the absence of a definite and ascertainable beneficiary is, as a general rule, fatal to the validity thereof.

As was said in Nichols v. Allen (1881) 130 Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445: "A trust which by its terms may be applied to objects which are not charitable in the legal sense, and to persons not defined by name or class, is too indefinite to be carried out."

This rule has been applied in each of the following cases, wherein it was held that a testamentary provision, giving an executor or a third person discretionary power to select the person or persons who were to receive a bequest or devise, was void for lack of definiteness or certainty: Wilce v. Van Anden (1911) 248 Ill. 358, 140 Am. St. Rep. 212, 94 N. E. 42, 21 Ann. Cas. 153; Nichols v. Allen (1881) 130 Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445; Minot v. Atty. Gen. (1905) 189 Mass. 176, 75 N. E. 149; Walter v. Walter (1908) 60 Misc. 383, 113 N. Y. Supp. 465, affirmed in (1909) 133 App. Div. 893, 118 N. Y. Supp. 268, which is affirmed in (1910) 197 N. Y. 606, 91 N. E. 1122; Weller v. Weller (1899) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 54 S. W. 652; Vezey v. Jamson (1822) 1 Sim. & Stu. 69, 57 Eng. Reprint, 27; Ross v. Ross (1893) 25 Can. S. C. 307; Higginson v. Kerr (1898) 30 Ont. Rep. 62; McIsaac v. Beaton (1905) 37 Can. S. C. 143, 3 Ann. Cas. 612.

The rule heretofore stated is aptly illustrated in Vezey v. Jamson (1822) 1 Sim. & Stu. 69, 57 Eng. Reprint, 27, wherein it appeared that a testator gave the residue of his estate to his executors in trust to dispose of in their discretion, either for charitable or public purposes, or to any "person or persons," or otherwise, as they might see fit; and it was held, the gift being expressly on trust, that the trustees could not hold it for their own benefit; and, the purpose of the trust being so general and undefined as to be incapable of execution by the court, a trust resulted for the next of kin.

In Nichols v. Allen (1881) 130

Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445, it appeared that a testatrix devised her residuary estate to her executors, "to be by them distributed to such persons, societies, or institutions as they may consider most deserving;" and it was held that the executors took in trust, but that, the testatrix not having defined the trust sufficiently to enable the court to execute it, the residuary estate passed to her next of kin by way of a resulting trust.

A case somewhat analogous to that of the reported case (EGLESTON v. TRUST CO. OF GEORGIA, ante, 295) arose in Minot v. Atty. Gen. (1905) 189 Mass. 176, 75 N. E. 149, wherein it appeared that the testator authorized his executors, or the survivor of them, to use the estate bequeathed for charitable objects, and "for the purpose of giving to any relative of mine, whom without apparent reason I may have overlooked, such sum as may seem to them or him, under all the circumstances, fitting, suitable, and proper." The court said that there was "an intention plainly expressed to include certain of his relations, though they may be indefinitely described," and held that the several purposes were not charitable in a legal sense, and, as the fund could be applied for such purpose as the executors might deem proper, there was no charitable trust created. The court further said: "When an attempt is made to define the class of relatives intended, there is nothing disclosed by any extrinsic facts from which it can be determined that any of the testator's relatives whom he may have omitted were unintentionally overlooked. . . . He might have said, Any relative whom I may have omitted, and it may be that this could be held to mean those for whom he had not provided, but who, in the event of his intestacy, would have shared in the distribution of his estate. . . . Of course, under such a construction, those who were to take could be readily determined; but his purpose evidently was not so broad, for he adds a limiting and discriminating phrase, 'whom without apparent reason I may have overlooked.' While the general intention of the testator that the residue of his estate should be held by the executors in trust is fully apparent, the unfortunate terms he employed to express this permits the fund, as we have said, to be wholly applied for objects which are not charitable in law; or for purposes so uncertain as not to be capable of identification; or for the benefit of relatives not named, and who, by reason of the descriptive limitation imposed by him, cannot otherwise be ascertained. The whole trust, therefore, becomes too indefinite for the court to administer, and a resulting trust must be decreed in favor of his next of kin."

A similar ruling was given in Higginson v. Kerr (1898) 30 Ont. Rep. 62, wherein it appeared that a testator provided as follows: "I desire that my executors herein named shall have full power to make such and any disposition of the residue and remainder of my property and estate as they, in their judgment, may deem best, and to make due inquiry into the financial and social standing of my relatives in Ireland, and, after an investigation and a proper knowledge is obtained, to make such grants and disposition of a portion of my estate and property as they in their judgment consider best, to such relation." The court held that this attempted disposition was void, saying: "The direction respecting the testator's relations in Ireland is that, after inquiry shall have been made, and after the investigation and proper knowledge obtained, the executors are to make grants and disposition of a portion of the estate and property, as they in their judgment consider best, to such relations. 'A portion' of the estate is mentioned, not stating what portion or what proportion, or affording any means of determining what portion or proportion of the estate and property. The subject is, therefore, quite undefined, and this alone would be fatal to the validity of the attempted disposition. But this is not all, for the objects of the attempted disposition are also indefinite. Both the subject and the object of this disposition, or attempted disposition, are left undefined and wholly in the discretion or judgment of the executors. This disposition is, as I think, void."

In Ross v. Ross (1898) 25 Can. S. C. 307, it appeared that a testator bequeathed a part of his estate to his brother, to be used for certain charitable purposes, and "amongst poor relatives as he may judge best." It was held that the quoted provision was too vague to be enforced. The court said: "'Poor relations' must be interpreted as meaning 'heirs at law.' The word 'poor' is too vague and uncertain to have any meaning attached to it, and must therefore be rejected. The word 'relations,' then standing alone, must be restricted to some particular class, for if it were to be construed generally, as meaning all relatives, it would be impossible ever to carry out the directions of the will. The line must, therefore, be drawn somewhere, and can only be drawn so as to exclude all except those whom the law, in the case of an intestacy, recognizes as the proper class among whom to divide the property of a deceased person who dies intestate, namely, his heirs."

Where a testator bequeathed a sum of money to an individual "for the purpose of dividing the same among such needy relatives . . . of my deceased mother . . . as he in his discretion and judgment may select," it was held that the words used did not create a trust, and that the personal representatives of the legatee were entitled to the sum. Walter v. Walter (1908) 60 Misc. 383, 113 N. Y. Supp. 465, affirmed in (1909) 133 App. Div. 893, 118 N. Y. Supp. 268, which is affirmed in (1910) 197 N. Y. 606, 91 N. E. 1122.

In Wilce v. Van Anden (1911) 248 Ill. 358, 140 Am. St. Rep. 212, 94 N. E. 42, 21 Ann. Cas. 153, it appeared that the testator authorized his trustees, after certain contingencies, to give so much of a fund "as they may think best and proper to any one or more of my brothers or sisters that may stand in need of the same, in the judgment of my said trustees, and the remainder thereof shall be devoted by said trustees, in their discretion, to the advancement of the cause of temperance, or in aid of one or more manual training schools in said city of Chicago." It was held that, as the trustees had power to give the entire fund to the brothers and sisters, the whole provision was void for uncertainty. The court said: "In the first place, it is uncertain what, if any, amount will remain upon the death of the annuitants; and, secondly, the trustees have a discretion as to whether they will give what remains, if any, after the death of the annuitants, to a needy brother or sister, or donate it to charity."

In McIsaac v. Beaton (1905) 37 Can. S. C. 143, 3 Ann. Cas. 612, it was held that an absolute estate devised to a testator's widow, "to be by her disposed of amongst my beloved children as she may judge most beneficial to her and them," did not constitute a trust which a court of equity could administer or enforce. See also Re McDougall (1904) 8 Ont. L. Rep. 640.

A similar decision was rendered in Weller v. Weller (1899) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 54 S. W. 652, wherein it appeared that a testator gave his estate to his wife "and her heirs forever, to have and to hold in her own use and benefit until my heirs become of age, and for her to divide equally the amount due to each that she in her judgment shall be entitled to." It was held that a fee-simple estate was vested in the wife, and that the words quoted did not create a trust.

III. Provision held valid.

In each of the following cases a testamentary provision, whereby an executor or a third person was given discretionary power to select the person or persons who should receive the testator's bounty, was held to be sufficiently definite to constitute a valid and enforceable gift: Lear v. Manser (1916) 114 Me. 342, 96 Atl. 240; Goodale v. Mooney (1881) 60 N. H. 528, 49 Am. Rep. 334; Carroll v. Adams (1907) 105 N. Y. Supp. 967; Green v. Collins (1845) 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 139; Stubbs v. Sargon (1837) 2 Keen, 255, 48 Eng. Reprint, 626, affirmed in (1838) 3 Myl. & C. 507, 40 Eng. Reprint, 1022, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 95, 2 Jur. 150; Re Cawthrope (1914) 26 Ont. Week. Rep. 762, 6 Ont. Week. N. 716.

In Goodale v. Mooney (1881) 60 N. H. 528, 49 Am. Rep. 334, it appeared that the will in question provided as follows: "I place the remainder of my property in the hands of my executors, to be distributed by them after my decease, among my relatives and for benevolent objects, in such sums as in their judgment shall be for the best." It was held that a valid bequest in trust was created, the court saying: "His intent, as thus disclosed, appears to have been to distribute his property to his relatives and for charitable objects; and we think it is a fair construction of the residuary clause to hold that the trustees might distribute the remainder of his estate to such relatives within the Statute of Distributions (Varrell v. Wendell (1846) 20 N. H. 431) as are needy, and to such charitable objects as he gave specific legacies to. The use of the word 'relatives' excludes all others as individuals. In authorizing his executors to dispose of the remainder to the distributees in such sums as in their judgment shall be best, he evidently had in view the necessities of his relatives, as well as the comparative claims for benevolent support of charitable institutions."

In Green v. Collins (1845) 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 139, wherein it appeared that a testator left the residue of his estate to his wife, "to be divided amongst my children as she thinks proper," it was held that an express trust was created which carried the capital and profits until a division to the children in such proportions as the mother might appoint. The court said: "To language so unequivocal it is vain to oppose suppositions that as the testator ought to have provided for his wife, and as he left it to her discretion to make a division among their children, therefore he might have intended to leave it also in her discretion to keep a part or all for herself. If he had such an intention, it is not to be found in the will; but the contrary, very plainly."

Where it appeared that a testatrix directed her residuary estate to be divided into three shares, one share going to a niece, "for her to divide as she thinks best" with her mother, sister, and four brothers, it was held that, as the will indicated the purpose of the testatrix to devise her property to her nephews and nieces, the bequest was in trust for the persons named. Carroll v. Adams (1907) 105 N. Y. Supp. 967.

In Stubbs v. Sargon (1837) 2 Keen, 255, 48 Eng. Reprint, 626, it appeared that the testatrix devised certain property to her trustees "in trust to dispose and divide the same unto and amongst my partners, who shall be in copartnership with me at the time of my decease, or to whom I may have disposed of my business, in such shares and proportions as my trustees shall think fit or deem advisable." It further appeared that the testatrix had no partners at the time of her decease, she having disposed of her business prior thereto. It was held that the persons among whom the trustees were to divide the property were the persons to whom she had sold the business.

In Re Cawthrope (1914) 26 Ont. Week. Rep. 762, a direction in a will wherein it appeared that the testatrix provided that "all the residue of my estate not hereinbefore disposed of I give and bequeath unto those of my relations who are needy, in such amounts, and to such of the same, as my executors see fit in their discretion," was held valid, the court saying: "In this case there is, I think, a gift of the residue of the estate, to be distributed among such of the needy relations of the testatrix, and in such amounts, as the executor may see fit; a gift which the court would carry into effect if the executors failed to exercise their power over it; but with which the court will not interfere if the executors in good faith, and uninfluenced by improper motives, exercise within a reasonable time their power over it."

In Lear v. Manser (1916) 114 Me. 342, 96 Atl. 240, it appeared that the testator gave the residue of his estate to his executor in trust, "to be paid by him to such person or persons, or to such institution, as shall care for me in my last sickness, such payment to be made to the person or persons, or institution, or any or all of them, as may, in the discretion of my said executor, be equitably entitled thereto." It further appeared that the testator, who was an elderly man, having no nearer relatives than nieces, boarded with a woman for a period of nineteen months prior to his death, and that she cared for him in his last illness; and it was held that she was the person who cared for the testator in his "last sickness," and that the property held by the executor in trust was to be paid to her as the sole beneficiary thereunder. The court said: "In the case at bar the testator did not identify by name the beneficiary of his bequest. But did he not, by the terms of his will, make his intended beneficiary capable of identification with certainty? That is the precise question here involved. The beneficiary intended was to be 'such person or persons, or institution, as shall care for me in my last sickness.' That was the specific description by which the cestui que trust was to be identified. The provision had respect to the then future when there would be some person or persons, or institution, that had cared for the testator in his last sickness. No one can doubt what is the meaning of the words, 'care for me in my last sickness.' What particular person or persons, or institution, did furnish that care is a provable fact, and in our view readily provable. Indeed, it is established with entire certainty that Mrs. Bradbury is the person who cared for the testator in his last sickness. No one else claims to have done so." Compare, however, Murdock v. Bridges (1897) 91 Me. 124, 39 Atl. 475, wherein it appeared that the donor, by a nontestamentary writing, gave her property to W. E. Murdock in trust to pay her debts and then provide for her husband during his life, and after his death "the balance shall go to the people who have cared for me, as W. E. Murdock shall think best." The court held that the trust could not be carried out, for want of certainty as to the beneficiaries, it being a pure benevolence, and not a charity.

Mr. John T. Williams for the sheriff.

Melvin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A writ of habeas corpus was issued upon the petition of Sam Farb, found guilty under a complaint charging him with violation of chapter 172 of the Statutes of California of 1917. It is conceded by petitioner's counsel that the one question involved in a final determination of this matter is whether or not that part of the statute is constitutional which prohibits an employer from entering into a contract requiring an employee to surrender to the employer all tips or gratuities received for services rendered to the public on behalf of the employer.

The part of the act pertinent to this discussion is as follows: "Any employer or agent or representative of an employer or other person having authority from his employer to hire, employ or direct the services of other persons in the employment of said employer, who shall demand or receive directly or indirectly from any person then in the employment of said employer, any fee, gift or other remuneration or consideration, or any part or portion of any tips or gratuities received by such employee while in the employment of said employer, in consideration or as a condition of such employment or hiring or employing any person to perform such services for such employer or of permitting said person to continue in such employment, is guilty of a misdemeanor." Stat. 1917, p. 257.

It is the contention of petitioner that this statute permits a violation of the right of employers and employees freely to enter into contracts, that it is in conflict with the provisions of the Federal and state Constitutions, and that it seeks to make an improper extension of the police power of the state.

Respondent seeks to justify the statute upon the ground that it is designed to relieve the public against fraud and imposition arising from the employer's failure to notify the public that the gratuities bestowed upon employees go to the employer; and upon the further ground that the legislature is empowered to enact such laws to "provide for the comfort, health, safety, and general welfare of any and all employees." Cal. Const. art. 20, § 17½. It is further contended in opposition to the writ that regulation will not accomplish the removal of the evil to be overcome, and that therefore the legislature has the right to prohibit any agreement whereby an employer may enjoy any part of the gratuities tendered to the employee.

At the outset it is to be noted that the statute under review does not, by its terms or otherwise, seek to limit or reduce the bestowal of tips or the practices by which either the keepers of places of public resort or those employed therein may try to wheedle or extort contributions from customers. That the custom of tipping has in many communities grown into proportions that astonish and dismay the person of moderate wealth is undoubtedly true; and that in many establishments one seeking accommodation must either tip or go unserved is equally well known. Therefore we may well concede that the police power might be invoked to prevent, by regulation, some of the evils arising from the tipping custom in those places where it has developed almost into organized blackmail. We cannot see how the statute before us would have any tendency by its operation to benefit the public generally. Indeed, it would rather have the opposite tendency, because the waiter or other employee engaged in serving the public would probably seek very keenly to coax or extort contributions from his customers if he were the sole beneficiary of such payments, while his enthusiasm and art would be less heartily enlisted in getting from customers gifts to be enjoyed exclusively or principally by the employer. The statute, if defensible at all, must be upheld therefore as a measure tending reasonably to protect employees in their health or safety, or to preserve their morals, or to promote their general welfare. That contracts to work, contracts to employ, and liberty freely to make such contracts come under the protection of the very first article of our Constitution, is undoubtedly true. It is also true that the constitutional guaranty freely to make such agreements, while apparently absolute, is qualified by the legislative authority to enact proper laws under the police powers of the state.

Constitutional law—protection of contracts.

—regulation—
police power.

It is also true that a large discretion is vested in the legislature in determining, not only the proper subjects for the exercise of the police power, but the methods of putting that power in force by statutes. Yet the courts must determine, in passing upon the constitutionality of such laws, whether or not that discretion has been exercised in such manner as to interfere unduly with the right of contract. We might quote very many authorities from many jurisdictions to illustrate the principles upon which such questions as that now before us should be determined, but we find a brief and sufficient declaration of them in Mr. Justice Shaw's language, in the opinion of this court in a matter involving the right of the limitation by law of the hours of work for women in certain occupations. We refer to Re Miller, 162 Cal. 687-693, 124 Pac. 428, where the following language was used:

Legislature—discretionary power.

Courts—power to supervise legislation.

"Because of the great value to mankind and the consequent paramount importance of the preservation of individual liberty, it is universally admitted and held that the police powers of the legislature are not absolute or unlimited. These personal rights cannot be taken away or impaired at the mere will of the legislature, nor at all, unless public welfare demands it. So far as the effect on himself alone is concerned, each person has the absolute right to judge for himself whether the hard labor which he voluntarily performs is for his best interest or not. The legislature cannot judge for persons in this respect, and interfere solely to prevent them from injuring themselves by excessive labor. The injury must be of such character and extent and to such a number of persons that it may be reasonably supposed that it will cause injury to others, that is, to the community in general, or, as it is expressed, to the public health and general welfare. Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 136, 38 L. ed. 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499.

"The means adopted to produce the public benefit intended, or to prevent the public injury, must be reasonably necessary to accomplish that purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals. The determination of the legislature as to these matters is not conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts, and, if the above qualities are wanting, a law arbitrarily interfering with the right of contract, or imposing restrictions upon lawful occupations, will be held void."

In Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, at page 380, 59 L. ed. 628, 630, L.R.A.1915F, 829, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, 343, involving the same statute, Mr. Justice Hughes thus briefly described the question arising in all cases of this sort: "As the liberty of contract guaranteed by the Constitution is freedom from arbitrary restraint,—not immunity from reasonable regulation to safeguard the public interest,—the question is whether the restrictions of the statute have reasonable relation to a proper purpose."

Upon the principles above announced, courts have not hesitated to sustain statutes enacted in pursuance of the police power, having the legitimate function of protecting the health or morals of certain classes, but they have been equally ready to apply constitutional rules to the overthrow of laws which, under the guise of such regulation, have interfered with the freedom of contract. It will suffice for the purposes of this discussion to cite a few of the leading cases of that kind. In Adams v. Tanner, 244 U. S. 590, 594, 61 L. ed. 1336, 1342, L.R.A. 1917F, 1163, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 973, the Supreme Court of the United States considered a law enacted by the people of the state of Washington, by which it was declared unlawful for any employment agent to demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any person seeking employment, any fee for furnishing him or her with employment or information leading thereto. The statute was held to be in violation of the guaranty of liberty secured by the 14th Amendment. In the course of the prevailing opinion in that case, Mr. Justice McReynolds, answering the contention that certain abuses had grown up in connection with the business of conducting employment agencies, used the following language: "Certainly there is no profession, possibly no business, which does not offer peculiar opportunities for reprehensible practices; and as to every one of them, no doubt, some can be found quite ready earnestly to maintain that its suppression would be in the public interest. Skillfully directed agitation might also bring about apparent condemnation of any one of them by the public. Happily for all, the fundamental guaranties of the Constitution cannot be freely submerged if and whenever some ostensible justification is advanced and the police power invoked."

This language is peculiarly apt in view of the arguments advanced in defense of the statute here under review. We are cited to the incident of a man who employed girls to attend to the checking of hats. These girls were required, as a condition of retaining their employment, to put all tips into a locked box through a slot, and were compelled to comply with the requirements that they should wear dresses and aprons having no pockets, lest they might secrete some of the money and take it away with them. Such an exaction would, of course, be humiliating to the employee, but one desiring to avoid it might resign.

In Coppage v. State, 236 U. S. 1, 59 L. ed. 441, L.R.A.1915C, 960, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240, a statute of the defendant in error, making it a misdemeanor for an employer to require an employee to agree not to become a member of any labor organization during the time of the employment, was held repugnant to the "due process" clause of the 14th Amendment. After citing Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, 13 Ann. Cas. 764, to the effect that the right to sell and the right to purchase labor are correlative, and each subject to regulation by contract, Mr. Justice Pitney, who wrote the opinion of the court, said (236 U. S. 12):

"Granted the equal freedom of both parties to the contract of employment, has not each party the right to stipulate upon what terms only he will consent to the inception or to the continuance of that relationship? And may he not insist upon an express agreement, instead of leaving the terms of the employment to be implied? Can the legislature in effect require either party at the beginning to act covertly; concealing essential terms of the employment,—terms to which, perhaps, the other would not willingly consent,—and revealing them only when it is proposed to insist upon them as a ground for terminating the relationship? . . . Can the right of making contracts be enjoyed at all, except by parties coming together in an agreement that requires each party to forego, during the time and for the purpose covered by the agreement, any inconsistent exercise of his constitutional rights?"

"These queries answer themselves. The answers, as we think, lead to a single conclusion: Under constitutional freedom of contract, whatever either party has the right to treat as sufficient ground for terminating the employment, where there is no stipulation on the subject, he has the right to provide against by insisting that a stipulation respecting it shall be a sine qua non of the inception of the employment, or of its continuance if it be terminable at will."

The statute before us is not defensible as a regulatory measure upon any of the grounds which have operated to uphold laws prescribing hours of labor, conditions of workshops, and the like; but this court is urged to uphold it upon the ground that it is designed to protect the public from fraud. We are told that gratuities are bestowed not upon the employer, but upon the employee, as a reward for promptness or politeness or skill beyond the mere performance of his duty to serve his master's customers, and that when this personal gift is appropriated by the employer a fraud upon the giver is perpetrated. If we concede the correctness of this contention, for the purposes of discussion, still we must declare the statute void, as seeking to overcome by prohibition of any contract between employer and employee, a deception which would instantly disappear if the former were required to post in his place of business a notice of the terms of the contract, whereby he was to have the benefit of gratuities. It can hardly be doubted that an employer might (as a few of them do) forbid the employee, under pain of dismissal for disobedience, to accept any tips. This would be no fraud upon the customer. How then would the customer be defrauded if he were informed that he might not give a tip to the employee, but might bestow a gratuity upon the employer? To ask the question answers it. The law does not tolerate the prohibition of something which may be regulated in such way as to overcome any evils which may be incidentally connected with it. As was said in Adams v. Tanner, supra: "Appellant's occupation as agent for workers cannot exist unless the latter pay for what they receive. To say it is not prohibited because fees may be collected for something done in behalf of other principals is not good reasoning. The statute is one of prohibition, not regulation. 'You take my house when you do take the prop that doth sustain my house; you take my life when you do take the means whereby I live!'"

In other words, even if it be conceded that the object of the statute is to protect the public from fraud, existing because of keeping people in ignorance of the ultimate disposition of tips bestowed upon employees, the means used to accomplish that object are most unreasonable. It has been held in California that while the legislature might well regulate or prohibit the transportation of diseased fruit, or prevent deception in the labeling of it, a law requiring every package of fruit to bear a label, naming the county and immediate locality in which the fruit was grown, could not be upheld as a legitimate exercise of the police power. Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183, 82 Pac. 315. It has also been held that, while regulations to prevent deception of the public by the offer of stale eggs as fresh ones are beneficial laws and should be upheld, this object would not be attained by laws requiring each egg brought from without the state of California to bear a printed declaration of the fact of its importation. Re Foley, 172 Cal. 744, 158 Pac. 1034, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 180. These and other authorities which might be cited confirm the doctrine that reasonable regulation, where it is practicable, is the only method by which incidental evils sometimes attaching to a legitimate business or calling may be overcome and abolished.

In the foregoing discussion it has been conceded for the purposes of argument that concealment from the customer of the contract by which gratuities are enjoyed by the employer amounts to a fraud upon the said customer. There is nothing essentially immoral in the contract itself, whereby the employee agrees to work for a certain wage and to surrender all tips to his employer. Supreme court of Iowa (correctly, we think) approved an instruction to the effect that while the plaintiff, a bootblack, would be entitled to any gifts by way of tips, the employer might, if he could, prove an agreement on plaintiff's part to turn the tips over to him. Zappas v. Roumeliote, 156 Iowa, 709, 137 N. W. 935. If it is lawful, as between employer and employee, to provide for the ownership of tips given into the possession of the latter, it can hardly be said that the patron's ignorance of it makes the contract unlawful. A waiter, for example, might buy a suit of clothes and agree with the tailor that he would apply all tips to the payment of the bill for the garments until the stipulated price should be fully paid. Would the patrons bestowing those gratuities be defrauded by their ignorance of the contract? Assuredly they would not. Yet such a contract does not differ in principle from one whereby the servant agrees to forego the enjoyment of tips for the sake of his salary, and of retaining his position. In either case it would make no difference whether the extra payment or gift were bestowed because of the good quality of the food (for which the waiter might not be responsible); or the comfort of the chair (for which the barber might deserve no credit); or because of the beauty of the girl in the hatroom, the sweet voice of the cabaret singer, the deftness of the bootblack, or any other attribute or excellence of a personal nature. Even if we concede that the gratuity is essentially a personal earning of the employee, nevertheless it must be true that one may enter into a contract involving the expenditure of one's earnings.

The statute under review is void because it is in conflict with the "due process" provision of the Constitution of the United States, and with § 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of California.

Petitioner dismissed from custody.

We concur: Shaw, J.; Sloss, J.; Wilbur, J.; Lorigan, J.

Angellotti, Ch. J., concurring:

I am of the opinion that, in so far as the act under discussion prohibits any contract between the employer and the employee that all or any tips and gratuities received by the employee while in the employment of the employer shall belong and be paid to the employer, or that prohibits any demand or receipt by the employer from the employee of the tips and gratuities to which he is entitled under any such contract, it is in violation of provisions of the Federal and state Constitutions. In my opinion the only conceivable ground upon which this portion of the act might be upheld is that it was essential to the protection of the public against fraud. As is shown by the prevailing opinion, the only possible fraud on the public is the keeping of them in ignorance of the ultimate disposition of tips and gratuities conferred by them. That this evil might be sufficiently overcome by reasonable regulation short of absolutely prohibiting a contract between the employee and employer is also sufficiently shown in the opinion. This being so, the authorities amply sustain the conclusion that there can be no such prohibiting of contract. See also Re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 796, 109 Am. St. Rep. 178, 82 Pac. 241.

I therefore concur in the judgment discharging the petitioner.

Richards, Judge pro tem. dissenting:

I dissent. The statute under review in this proceeding was not chiefly designed, as the prevailing opinion seems to indicate, "to protect employees in their health or safety, or to preserve their morals, or to promote their general welfare." Its chief and obvious purpose was to deal with the relation or transaction arising between patrons of places of public resort for service, pleasure, or instruction, and the servitors in such places, wherein the former seeks to insure or reward promptness, fidelity, and courtesy on the part of the latter in the performance of some particular service, by the giving to such servitor a sum of money popularly known as a "tip." In the individual instance the offering is usually small and the service slight, but in the concrete a very large proportion of the general public is affected by what has grown to become an almost universal custom. Every person who travels in this age of travel, or who patronizes hotels or restaurants, or attends theaters, lectures, or other public places of amusement or instruction, is affected by the custom of giving and receiving tips.

Whether or not it is a pernicious custom, savoring of extortion, and furnishing a fertile soil for flunkeyism, favoritism, and partiality in respect to those elements of promptness, fidelity, and courtesy to which patrons of such public places or conveniences are equally entitled without the voluntary offering or the compulsion of such gratuities, the law in question does not attempt to determine. All that it does is to say that the employer and the servitor shall not make an agreement between themselves, the effect of which would be to divert the gratuity given by the individual patron from the person for whom it was intended, and thus destroy the incentive to prompt, faithful, and courteous service which prompted the gift. Can it be said that a statute which has for its object the preservation of the spirit, intent, and effect of a relation and agreement to which, in the concrete, the general public is the most largely interested party, is invalid when it seeks to prevent the proprietor and the servitor from making another agreement, to which the general public is not a party, the effect of which is to divert the consideration, destroy the incentive, and render ineffectual the relation created by the former agreement? To my mind the right of freedom of contract does not extend so far as to embrace the freedom to make one contract which shall violate the spirit, intent, and obligation of another, particularly when that other is one of a class of like agreements so infinite in number as to affect the public at large.

In addition to this, however, the contract, the freedom to enter into which is upheld by the prevailing opinion, is one which is in its essence unconscionable and fraudulent, and is also one which in many if not most instances is devoid of that very element of freedom as to one of the parties by which it is sought to be justified. It is unconscionable, because by its terms the employer, as the proprietor of the place or service in connection with which the tip is received by his employee, is not entitled to it, since he is already fully paid for whatever he furnishes by his regular charges, which cover and compensate him for the fullest measure of promptness, fidelity, and courtesy toward his patrons on the part of his employees. To permit him to exact more is not only to legalize an overcharge, but is also to encourage discriminations in the price and quality of his service as between those of his patrons who do and those who do not submit to the overcharge. It is fraudulent in respect to those patrons, because it secretly aims to take from them that which they intended for another, and because its effect is to destroy the very incentive for doing those things for which the gratuity was given. The porter, the waiter, the bellboy, the chambermaid, who either willingly or unwillingly enters into a contract with his or her employer by which the tip is to be surrendered, has no longer any interest in doing promptly, faithfully, and courteously the service which the tip was given to insure, and, to the extent of the inevitable lapses in the efficiency of such service, the immediate patron, and by extension the general public, is defrauded of its due.

The suggestion in the prevailing opinion that all this would be avoided by the simple expedient of having the proprietor post in his establishment a notice to the effect that all tips paid to his employees were by agreement to belong to the employer has, it is true, the merit of simplicity, but has nothing else to recommend it. That such notices, as a matter of common knowledge, have never been posted anywhere, may be taken to be sufficient proof that the publication of such an agreement by that means would defeat the very purpose for which the agreement was made, by stopping the flow of tips at once, since the public would have no interest in giving tips to servitors who had no longer any interest in doing the service with the degree of promptness, fidelity, and courtesy which the tip was given to induce. Besides, it is not the province of the courts to suggest similar ways of remedying admitted evils as a reason for refusing to uphold those which the legislature has seen fit to adopt, in the exercise of its right of selection in the choice of remedies. In so far as the elements of freedom of contract, as between the proprietor and his employee, is concerned, upon which emphasis is laid in the prevailing opinion, it may be safely said that the trend of modern authority and decision is against the longer acceptance of that outworn fiction upon which Adam Smith predicated much of his impractical economics. How much is there of mutual freedom of contract between the proprietor, who has his choice and time in the matter of selecting his servants, and the average applicant for the position of waiter or bellboy or chambermaid, whose every hour of unemployment is a step nearer to starvation? We have already banished this fiction from many of our statutes and decisions, regulating the obligations and liabilities arising out of the relation of master and servant. Why, then, should we invoke it to defeat a piece of salutary legislation, framed in the public interest, and intended not only to forbid fraud upon the public, but also to prevent employers from compelling their employees, under the pretense of an agreement which would not as a rule, from the very nature of things, be voluntary, to yield up to their employers that which they have no right to appropriate? The illustration used in the prevailing opinion of the waiter agreeing with his tailor to turn over to him his tips in payment for a suit of clothes has no possible aptitude, since in that case the incentive is left in the waiter to earn the tips in order that he may the sooner enjoy the clothes, while no such incentive remains when, by previous agreement or compulsion, his employer appropriates his tips; and, if it be argued that he would still strive to deserve the tip in order to hold the job, then what becomes of the argument based upon his supposititious freedom of contract?

The cases cited in support of the views expressed in the prevailing opinion have no application to the instant case, since their facts bear no similitude to those of the case at bar. The statute under review is novel, and the case is one of first impression. The subject with which the statute deals is one in which the public interest is so far involved as to bring it properly within the purview of the police powers of the state. It is practically conceded in the prevailing opinion that the legislature might well and safely have enacted a statute abolishing altogether the custom of tipping, and declaring it unlawful to permit this practice in any place of public resort, for the reason, as well stated therein, "that the custom of tipping has in many communities grown into proportions that astonish and dismay persons of moderate wealth, and that in many establishments one seeking accommodation must either tip or go unserved." That the state has the almost unlimited power to regulate that which it has full power to destroy has been too frequently decided to require the citation of authority. The statute in question is a step in the way of such regulation which should be sustained upon all the grounds urged in its support.

The writ should therefore be discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of law regulating right to tips as between master and servant.

The only case found passing upon the constitutionality of the law regulating the right to tips as between an employer and employee, is the reported case (EX PARTE FAEB, ante, 301) which holds that while, primarily, tips to a servant belong to the latter, nevertheless it is lawful for an employee and his employer to contract that the latter shall have an interest therein; and hence a law is unconstitutional, as interfering with the right to contract, which prohibits the employer from contracting with his employee that the latter shall account to the former for all tips received. This position finds support in Wilcocks v. Phillips (1843) 1 Wall. Jr. 47, Fed. Cas. No. 17,639, which holds that the question as to the right to "kumshaw" a present to a captain of a ship is to be determined according to general custom, and usage, and that the owner of the ship is not entitled to such presents, or any part thereof, unless it is the custom and usage for the captain to account therefor. That the employer and employee, in the absence of a statute at least, have a right to contract for the disposition of tips, is sustained in Zappas v. Roumeliote (1912) 156 Iowa, 709, 137 N. W. 935, which holds that while, primarily, tips received by a bootblack belong to him personally, yet nevertheless, if the master establishes by the burden of proof an agreement on the part of the employee to turn the tips over to him, he is entitled to the same.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Floyd County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the operation of a cotton ginnery and gasoline engine, and for damages. Reversed.

Statement by Evans, P. J.:

Mrs. Leila Tate is the owner of a small cottage occupied by herself, her husband, and their children. T. H. Mull owns an adjoining tract of land upon which he has constructed a cotton ginnery. Mrs Tate brought an action against Mull, alleging that the gasoline engine used in propelling the machinery of the gin created unusual noises, which were very trying to her nerves and health; that the defendant erected a seed house midway between the ginnery and her house, into which seed house he forced the seed by air suction, which method caused a great quantity of dust to be forced through the cracks of the seed house, and the same would settle in her house and on the floors and furniture; that the dust and lint defiled the air, rendering it unhealthy for her to live in her home; and that the operation of the ginnery is a nuisance. The prayer was for damages, and for an injunction against the operation of the ginnery and engine. On the trial, the plaintiff submitted proof tending to show that a short time after she built her home the defendant erected his ginnery; that no objection to its erection was made by her at that time; that the ginhouse is about 35 or 40 yards from the plaintiff's residence, and the seed house is halfway between the ginnery and the residence; that the seed is forced into the seed house from the ginnery by means of air suction; that there are cracks between the planks of the seed house, and through these cracks the dust and lint from the seed are expelled and settle over the floors and window sills and on the furniture in the plaintiff's house; that the ginnery when in operation makes a great deal of noise, being propelled by a gasoline engine which is continually back-firing and making a noise like the discharge of a shotgun; that when the gin is running it is necessary to close all the doors of the residence and let the windows down, in order to engage in ordinary conversation; that the plaintiff's property was worth $300 before the ginnery was erected, and it is not worth more than a third of that amount since the ginnery was put in operation. After the plaintiff and her husband and two other witnesses had testified to this effect, and while a witness for the plaintiff was upon the stand, he was asked to state the effect of the operation of the cotton gin upon the residence as affecting its desirability for a home. The court interposed and informed counsel for the plaintiff that the question of an injunction was not in the case, and he would instruct the jury to find against an injunction, because plaintiff had allowed the defendant to construct the ginnery without attempting to prohibit the same; but that he would allow the case to proceed for the recovery of damages. The plaintiff's counsel thereupon renounced all right to recover damages, and insisted that under the evidence he was entitled to go before the jury on the question as to whether the operation of the ginnery, under circumstances disclosed in the evidence, should be enjoined as amounting to the maintenance of a nuisance. Thereupon the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff, denying an injunction.

Messrs. Harris & Harris for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. McHenry & Porter for defendant in error.

Evans, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Civil Code, § 4457, defines a nuisance as "anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful does not keep it from being a nuisance. The inconvenience complained of must not be fanciful, or such as would affect only one of fastidious taste, but it must be such as would affect an ordinary reasonable man." The operation of a cotton gin is not per se a nuisance, but it may become so under certain circumstances.

duty as to use of property.

A landowner has no right to conduct a lawful business on his own land in such a way as to invade and injure his neighbor's property. The evidence was to the effect that the defendant erected a seed house near his ginnery and a few yards from the plaintiff's residence, into which seed house he forced the seed from the ginnery by air suction, which method caused a great quantity of dust to be forced through the cracks of the seed house and to settle in the plaintiff's home and on the floors and the furniture therein, the effect of which was to depreciate the value of the home by $200. From this evidence the jury would be authorized to find that the defendant was maintaining an actionable nuisance.

obtain an injunction against the maintenance of a nuisance, it must appear that by reason of its gravity, permanent character, or both, the plaintiff cannot be adequately compensated in damages, or that the injury must be continuing so as to cause a constantly recurring grievance. Farley v. Gate City Gaslight Co. 105 Ga. 323, 337, 31 S. E. 193. Although the plaintiff waived her right to damages, if the jury should find from the evidence that the manner in which the gin was operated constituted a nuisance, with resultant injury to the plaintiff's property, and the nuisance was a continuing one, the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction against its continued maintenance. The circumstance that the ginnery was constructed in close proximity to the plaintiff's residence, without objection on her part, does not deprive her of her right to bring an action to enjoin the operation of the ginnery in such a way as to make it a nuisance. The doctrine of estoppel does not apply where a landowner sees his neighbor erecting a building to be used in a lawful enterprise, where there is nothing to suggest that the machinery therein employed will be so improperly operated as to injure and damage his property. The plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction against the operation of the ginnery in a proper manner; but if it is made to appear that its operation is in such manner as to amount to a continuing nuisance, she would be entitled to an injunction against the defendant maintaining such nuisance. *Faulkenbury v. In Norcross v. Thoms (Me.) supra, it appeared that the defendant moved his blacksmith shop within a few feet of the plaintiff's hotel, and, by reason of the cinders, dust, and ashes arising from the shop, the plaintiff was injured in his property and suffered a loss. It was held that the business as so located and operated was a nuisance.

In Rodenhausen v. Craven (1891) 141 Pa. 546, 23 Am. St. Rep. 306, 21 Atl. 774, it appeared that a carpet-cleaning establishment was conducted by the defendant. When carpets were being cleaned, dust and moths sifted into the adjoining house, causing considerable annoyance. The owner was not even able to lay his carpets. In affirming an injunction restraining defendants from maintaining a nuisance, it was held that a carpet-cleaning establishment was not per se a nuisance, but it might become so by the manner in which the business was conducted. The court said: "The evidence fully justified the finding of the master that defendant's stable and carpet-cleaning establishment were nuisances. While such establishments are not necessarily nuisances, or nuisances per se, they may become so by reason of their location and the manner in which the business is conducted. It is necessary to have carpets cleaned, and this involves a place where such work may be done; but care should be exercised to locate such establishments where they will cause the least annoyance to others. In this case, the defendants selected a neighborhood devoted to private residences, and immediately adjoining the complainant's house. The natural result followed, and his home was rendered uncomfortable by the dust and moths from the carpets in the process of cleaning. This was not an imaginary grievance; it was a reality,—a nuisance of a very serious character."

Coal or coke handling.

In Kroecker v. Camden Coke Co. (N. J.) supra, a bill to enjoin the operation of certain works which produced smoke, dust, soot, dirt, gases, and vapors, and caused discomforts, and depreciated the value of real estate in that neighborhood, it appeared that the dust was caused by the loading, unloading, and dumping of soft coal and coke. In granting the relief sought it was held that dust, smoke, soot, dirt, and cinders constituted a nuisance. The court said: "It was attempted to be shown by the defendant in this case that there was more or less smoke arising from other factories and from locomotives in the same neighborhood where complainants live, but, after giving full consideration to all the evidence on this subject, and having regard to the smoke almost incessantly emitted from one or more of the defendant's 150 coke ovens, day and night, and especially having regard to the unceasing activity of the steam bucket dipping up and dumping down soft coal and coke, a ton and a half at a time, each time creating a cloud of dust, day and night, as well as considering the enormous quantity of coal and coke thus handled every twenty-four hours, I am of opinion that the smoke from the defendant's ovens, taken with the coal dust and coke dust produced by this coal-handling apparatus, created a completely new state of things as regards the complainant's premises, and that such smoke and dust materially interfere with the comfort of human existence in the complainants' houses, and, as seen in Crump v. Lambert (1867) L. R. 3 Eq. (Eng.) 409,

In Wylie v. Elwood (1890) 134 Ill. 281, 9 L.R.A. 726, 23 Am. St. Rep. 673, 25 N. E. 570, it appeared that the defendants maintained a coal shed and handled large quantities of coal by means of steam-driven machinery, causing large quantities of coal dust and dirt to invade the plaintiff's house. The action was for damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the coal dust and dirt settling on books, furniture, clothing and food, and other places. A question arising as to the right of plaintiff to maintain the suit, as the act complained of was in the nature of a public nuisance, the court held that while the nuisance was public in nature, the plaintiff, having suffered special damages, could recover therefor. It was said: "In the case at bar, if the coal dust falls upon the furniture, food, and clothing in the appellee's house, he suffers a special damage to his own property, even though it be true that coal dust from the same coal shed falls upon the man who passes on the street in front of his door, or upon similar articles of property in his neighbor's house. If the noise of the grinding machinery deafen him in his own dwelling, the rest and quiet, which he is entitled to enjoy in his home, are disturbed, and he is none the less injured because the home of his neighbor is rendered unendurable from the same cause. Injury to a vested right is a sufficient special damage to maintain an action against the promoter of a public offense."

In Pwllbach Colliery Co. v. Woodman [1915] A. C. (Eng.) 634, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 833, it appeared that both the plaintiff and the defendants were lessees of the same lessor, and that coal dust from the defendants' plant blew on the premises of plaintiff, invading his house and causing injury to his meats. The court said: "The jury found that this was a nuisance, but that the operations of the company were carried on in a reasonable manner and in the ordinary way in which such operations are usually carried on in the county of Glamorgan.

Also they found that the nuisance was not caused by the negligence of the company. At the trial, judgment was entered for the defendant company, but the court of appeals reversed that judgment, and now it comes before your Lordships. It is quite clear that if a nuisance has been committed no one can excuse it by simply saying: I only did what is usually done in this county, and I was not in any way negligent. No doubt the character of the locality may be considered when the question is whether or not there has been any nuisance, but here that question is settled by the jury's verdict. Nor is it material that the company are absolved from negligence. Their duty to their neighbor is not merely to take care so as to avoid causing a nuisance. Their duty is to abstain from causing one and all, unless, of course, they have a right to cause one, as, for example, by statute, or by consent of the complaining party or of someone whose consent binds him." The court further held that the jury had found that the nuisance complained of consisted in dust entering complainant's house, and settling on his meats and sausages. It was said: "In the present case the jury found the defendants guilty of nuisance. The nuisance consists in allowing a quantity of coal dust to escape from their works onto and into the plaintiff's shop, to the damage of the sausages and meat which the plaintiff keeps and sells there."

In Chicago-Virden Coal Co. v. Wilson (1896) 67 Ill. App. 443, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by smoke, gas, and dust being carried into his house and injuring his furniture and apparel, and causing great physical discomforts. The defendants were building a switch on an embankment of slack which ignited spontaneously, which caused the smoke, gas, and dust. It was held that these constituted a nuisance.

The relief sought in Kroecker v. Camden Coke Co. (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 373, 88 Atl. 955, was for an injunction restraining the operation of the defendant's works in such manner as to produce dust, smoke, soot, dirt, gases, and vapors. The court held that the works, by reason of the dust, soot, cinders, and smoke, were a nuisance. It was said: "I conclude, therefore, that at the time of the filing of the bill, and before and afterwards, down to the completion of the taking of the testimony, the defendant's works in this aspect of the case, that is, with respect to smoke, cinders, soot, and dirt, occasioned a nuisance of which each of the complainants, being an owner or occupier of property in that neighborhood, has a right to complain, and from which they and each of them have a right to relief in this court."

Cotton gin.

In Ponder v. Quitman Ginnery (1905) 122 Ga. 29, 49 S. E. 746, it appeared that the defendants maintained a cotton gin close to the plaintiff's house, and that dust, dirt, and lint were thrown into the air by artificial means, which damaged the plaintiff, settling on furniture, carpets, etc. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages. The court said: "The action is one for damages accruing from the erection and maintenance of a private nuisance. The tortious act complained of is the operation of a ginnery, situated in close proximity to the plaintiff's premises, in such a manner as to seriously interfere with her enjoyment thereof as a home. 'A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful does not keep it from being a nuisance. The inconvenience complained of must not be fanciful, or such as would affect only one of fastidious taste; it must be such as would affect an ordinary reasonable man.' Civ. Code, § 3861. The plaintiff has a natural right to the enjoyment of the unpolluted air; and if the defendant corporation, by contaminating the air with dust, dirt, and lint, thrown into the air by artificial means and blown into her dwelling, to her hurt and discomfort, has interfered with her enjoyment of the premises, the defendant must respond to her in damages. Swift v. Broyles (1902) 115 Ga. 885, 58 L.R.A. 390, 42 S. E. 277; Farley v. Gate City Gaslight Co.

The reported case (TATE v. MULL, ante, 310) holds that a cotton gin, while not a nuisance per se, may become so if operated in such a manner as to cause injury to a neighboring landowner by reason of the dust emitted therefrom.

In Faulkenbury v. Wells (1902) 28 Tex. Civ. App. 621, 68 S. W. 327, the suit was for damages caused by the operation of a cotton gin on adjoining premises. By reason of its operation, an owner of adjacent property was damaged by the noise, dust, smoke, and lint. The trial judge charged the jury that if they found that the gin created noise, dust, lint, or smoke, interfering with the comfortable enjoyment of adjoining property and house, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court, holding that these instructions were correct, said: "The court instructed the jury that the business in which defendants were engaged was lawful and not necessarily a nuisance, but might become so, when conducted in such close proximity to a private residence as to materially interfere with the comforts of such residence as a home. The jury was further instructed that if the defendants in the operation of the gin created and generated noise, dust, lint, or smoke, and that the same were carried into the house of Wells, and were calculated to and did, in material respects, interfere with Wells and his family in the comfortable enjoyment of their home, and that they were thereby subjected to the annoyances and discomforts alleged, then the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the damages sustained by Wells and wife in his lifetime. Appellants complain of these charges on the ground that they authorize the jury to find the gin to be a nuisance from the mere fact of its proximity to the Wells residence. The complaint is without merit. The charges, considered together, clearly negative the construction contended for by appellants, and authorized a recovery by the plaintiffs only in case the jury found that the gin, as located, constructed, and operated, constituted a nuisance. The charges given by the court rendered unnecessary the giving of additional instructions in regard to the right of appellants to pursue the business sought to be enjoined. Appellants offered to prove that it would cost them about $1,000 to move their plant to another location. The proposed testimony was excluded. This ruling of the court was correct. If the gin was a nuisance, appellees were entitled to have it abated."

Electric light plant.

In Pritchard v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1904) 92 App. Div. 178, 87 N. Y. Supp. 225, affirmed in (1904) 179 N. Y. 364, 72 N. E. 243, it appeared that the plaintiff was damaged by noise, vibration, smoke, soot, dust, cinders, and ashes, caused by the operation of the defendant's plant. It was held in affirming the judgment in favor of plaintiff that, the jury having found that the business constituted a nuisance, it was no defense to prove that the business could not have been conducted without being a nuisance. The court said: "The use to which the defendant put this property was no less a nuisance because no care in the operation of the machinery supplied would prevent it from being one. It is not alleged that the defendant negligently conducted its business, or that the machinery was not proper for that purpose, but that the generation of electricity upon these premises by proper machinery, carefully used, necessarily caused the vibration, dirt, dust, cinders, and odors that made the conduct of such a business in such a locality a nuisance; and the jury by their verdict having found that it was such a nuisance, it was no defense to prove that such a business could not have been conducted in such a locality without its being a nuisance."

Factory.

In Jackson v. Shawinigan Electro Products Co. (1918) 132 Md. 128, 103 Atl. 453, it appeared that the operation of a manufacturing plant caused a near-by owner of building lots damage by reason of noise, dust, smoke, vapor, etc., being blown upon the land. It was held, in reversing a judgment for the defendant, that there was sufficient evidence that such conditions amounted to a nuisance, even though the property was unimproved building lots. The court said: "There can be no doubt that there was legally sufficient evidence of such conditions as would amount to a nuisance if the property of the appellant was improved, but the appellee contends that the evidence does not show actual physical discomfort or a tangible visible injury to the property, it being unimproved, and hence it claims that there can be no recovery. There are authorities which have announced the rule in such terms as give some ground for that contention, but when they are applied to such conditions as are alleged to exist in this case, there can be no difficulty about them. The attorneys for the appellee quoted from §§ 511 and 640 of Wood on Nuisances at some length, but the next paragraph of § 511 concludes as follows: 'Where there are no buildings upon the premises, but the land is laid out into building lots, which by reason of the nuisance are reduced in value, a recovery may be had for the difference between the value of the lots with the nuisance there, and their value if no nuisance existed.' In the note are cited Peck v. Elder (1849) 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 126, and Dana v. Valentine (1842) 5 Met. (Mass.) 8. If that was not so, great injustice would be done owners of vacant land who had begun or intended to develop it. Of course, the fact of the properties of the plaintiffs being improved is of importance in nuisance cases, as when they are improved the plaintiffs can recover certain damages which they cannot recover when unimproved; but why a defendant should be made liable to A, who has a house on his lot, but not to B, whose lot is unimproved, if the nuisance in fact lessens the value of B's lot, or prevents him from selling it, is not easy to reconcile with the general principle of law that holds the owner of property responsible for so using his property that he injures others."

In Fish v. Dodge (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 311, 47 Am. Dec. 254, it appeared that the defendant demised part of his premises adjoining that of the plaintiff to carry on the business of boiler making, which caused damage to the plaintiff by reason of the noise and dust which entered into her house. The plaintiff kept a boarding house and was damaged by the boarders leaving. It was held that although the making of boilers was lawful, still, if it was carried on in such a manner as to cause annoyance to the plaintiff, she was entitled to recover.

In Sullivan v. Jones & L. Steel Co. (1904) 208 Pa. 540, 66 L.R.A. 712, 57 Atl. 1065, it appeared that in the manufacture of steel a certain fine iron ore was used which, during the process, flew over the near-by property, damaging furniture, carpets, roofs, fabrics, trees and other property. In granting an injunction the court said: "The right of a man to use and enjoy his property is as supreme as his neighbor's, and no artificial use of it by either can be permitted to destroy that of the other. To this rule, if at times there are apparently some exceptions, the present case is not one of them."

Flour mill.

In Cooper v. Randall (1869) 53 Ill. 24, it appeared that a flouring mill was operated on a lot adjacent to the plaintiff's premises, causing large quantities of chaff, dust, smut, and dirt to invade plaintiff's dwelling. It was held that the operation of the mill constituted a nuisance.

Limekiln.

In Hutchins v. Smith (1872) 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 251, it appeared that smoke, dust, and gases were diffused on lands adjoining limekilns. The court held that they constituted a nuisance, saying: "The plaintiff is entitled to enjoy his premises free from the presence of the smoke, gas, and dust proceeding from the defendant's kiln, and the defendants have no right thus to pollute the air and disturb the comfortable habitation and the enjoyment of the plaintiff's premises."

Sand pile.

In Dunsbach v. Hollister (1888) 49 Hun, 352, 2 N. Y. Supp. 95, affirmed in (1892) 132 N. Y. 602, 30 N. E. 1152, it appeared that a dealer in sand maintained a large pile of molding sand near the plaintiff's house. When the wind blew, it blew the sand about her house and it percolated into it, settling on furniture, carpets, curtains and the like. The court held, in affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff, that a business lawful in itself may be so conducted as to constitute a nuisance, saying: "The defendant's business is lawful, if properly conducted; it is not a nuisance per se, but may be so negligently conducted as practically to become a nuisance. . . . The rule that you must use your own so as not to injure another is not of universal application . . . but the rule has at least this extent: you must not use your own so as to injure another if you obviously can, with reasonable care and without unreasonable effort or expense, avoid it. The question becomes one of relative obligation or duty, and the violation of this duty is negligence. Now here, can there be any doubt which is the more reasonable: that the defendant shall build sheds or put some covering over his sand, or that the plaintiff must abandon her property?"

Stone or ore handling.

In Moon v. National Wall Plaster Co. (1900) 31 Misc. 631, 66 N. Y. Supp. 38, affirmed in (1900) 57 App. Div. 621, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1140, it appeared that, owing to remediable defects in the machinery of a plant calcining gypsum rock and manufacturing wall plaster, it threw obnoxious dust on premises of the adjoining owner. The court held that this constituted a nuisance.

In Cairns v. Canadian Ref. Co. (1914) 26 Ont. Week. Rep. 490, it appeared that particles of arsenic dust escaped from the defendant's works and were deposited on the plaintiff's premises to such an extent as to cause him material injury, poisoning his water and stock. In proceedings to restrain this escape of arsenic dust, it was held that the arsenic dust constituted a nuisance. The court said: "The defendants have no right to permit so dangerous a material as arsenic to escape from their premises into the atmosphere, and thence be carried by the wind upon the land of the plaintiff and others; and the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing and repeating the nuisance complained of in such a manner as to injuriously affect the plaintiff's said lands, or the plaintiff in his ownership and occupation thereof."

In Blackford v. Heman Constr. Co. (1908) 132 Mo. App. 157, 112 S. W. 287, it appeared that the defendants maintained a stone crusher which created a fine limestone dust. This dust percolated into the house of plaintiff, settling on carpets, dishes, furniture, and the like, and was a source of constant discomfort and annoyance. It was held, in affirming the grant of an injunction restraining the defendants from discomforting complainant by the escape of limestone dust, that this constituted a nuisance. The court said: "And likewise the defendants may be enjoined from permitting the escape of fine limestone dust which disturbs the comfortable enjoyment of the plaintiff's premises."

In Winters v. Winters (1898) 78 Ill. App. 417, it appeared that plaintiff's furniture was injured and his family annoyed by chaff, dust, and smoke blown into his house from a threshing machine. The court said: "The nuisance complained of was the setting of a grain-threshing machine within 200 feet of the plaintiff's dwelling, and the threshing of grain there a whole day, whereby dust, chaff, and smoke were blown into his house, to the annoyance of his family and the injury of his furniture. The plaintiff showed a clear right to recover."

In Catlin v. Patterson (1887) 10 N. Y. S. R. 724, it appeared that complainants were damaged by smoke, dust, and soot coming into their premises and destroying their merchandise, as a result of the defendant's conducting the business of woodworking. It was held in granting the injunction that the smoke, soot and dust constituted a nuisance. The court said: "I have examined the testimony with care, and have also taken a personal view of the premises of the parties and their surroundings, and have come to the conclusion that the smoke, smells, dust, and soot of which the plaintiffs complain proceed from the defendant's premises, and that they are so annoying to the plaintiffs as to constitute a nuisance."

In Harris v. Randolph Lumber Co. (1912) 175 Ala. 148, 57 So. 453, a demurrer to a declaration maintaining that near-by dwellings were rendered uncomfortable to tenants by reason of smoke, soot, and dust emanating from near-by mills was sustained. It was held in reversing the ruling that the declaration showed a sufficient cause of action for a nuisance consisting of dust, smoke, and soot.

In Citizens Planing Mill Co. v. Tunstall (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 424, it was alleged, among other things, that the planing mill of appellants caused great quantities of dust, smoke, and noxious vapors to be blown into complainant's house, causing damage and great inconvenience. It was held that the planing mill was a nuisance.

In Mahan v. Doggett (1905) 27 Ky. L. Rep. 103, 84 S. W. 525, the action was for damages caused by the operation of a sawmill. It appeared that a chute which carried off sawdust deposited it within a few feet of the plaintiff's property. The finer particles of dust invaded his house, causing injury to furniture, clothing, meals, carpets, and other contents, and also injured his garden. It was held in affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff that a person is entitled to enjoy his property in comfort, free from molestation and without its being injured. The court said: "The plaintiff was entitled not only to use his own property without its being injured by defendant, but he had the right to enjoy it in peace and in comfort, free from such molestation. If appellee's complaint was true, and the verdict of the jury found that it was, he was entitled to recover for the discomforts suffered by him and his family, in addition to the actual damage done to his property; or he was entitled to recover for such discomforts, even though his property sustained no actual damage."

In Miller v. Gates (1916) 62 Ind. App. 37, 112 N. E. 538, it was alleged among other things that a sawmill had been erected on an adjoining lot, which created dust, smoke, and other objectionable substances. These substances drifted into the residence of plaintiff and covered the contents thereof. It was held that there was sufficient set up in the complaint to show the creation of a nuisance.

Where the dust caused by the operation of a business is only occasional, and the resultant injury is slight, the operation of the business will not be restrained. Davis v. Whitney (1894) 68 N. H. 66, 44 Atl. 78; Hutchins v. Smith (1872) 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 251; Butterfield v. Klaber (1876) 52 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 255; Roscoe Lumber Co. v. Standard Silica Cement Co. (1901) 62 App. Div. 421, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1130; Bentley v. Empire Portland Cement Co. (1905) 48 Misc. 457, 96 N. Y. Supp. 831; Hamm v. Gunn (1908) 51 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 113 S. W. 304; Gose v. Coryell (1910) 59 Tex. Civ. App. 504, 126 S. W. 1164; Montreuil v. Ontario Asphalt Block Paving Co. (1911) 19 Ont. Week. Rep. 942, 2 Ont. Week. N. 1512; Oakley v. Webb (1916) 38 Ont. L. Rep. 151, 33 D. L. R. 35, 11 Ont. Week. N. 132, 27 Ont. Week. Rep. 544.

In Bentley v. Empire Portland Cement Co. (1905) 48 Misc. 457, 96 N. Y. Supp. 831, it appeared that whenever the wind was in a certain direction cinders, ashes, and cement dust were blown onto near-by premises. The rental value thereof was decreased $25 per year. This was a prayer to restrain the operation of these cement works which caused the annoyance. The court, while conceding that this constituted a nuisance, refused the prayer for an injunction on the grounds that the injury was only occasional, depending upon the direction of the wind, and was so slight as to enable the complainant to be compensated in damages.

In Roscoe Lumber Co. v. Standard Silica Cement Co. (1901) 62 App. Div. 421, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1130, a bill was brought to restrain the operation of defendant's works. It appeared that both the plaintiff's and the defendant's places of business were in a manufacturing section. After holding that the dust was insufficient to constitute a nuisance, the court said: "The rule sought to be applied in this case, if once established, would practically close every factory in the state, and no considerations of public policy or private right demand any such sacrifice of material industries."

In Montreuil v. Ontario Asphalt Block Paving Co. (1911) 19 Ont. Week. Rep. 942, a motion for an interim injunction restraining the defendants from allowing limestone dust, smoke, and foul odors to escape from their factory, it appeared that there had been an amelioration of these conditions. It was held that the situation, although a nuisance still remained, was not so intolerable as to necessitate the granting of this motion. The court said: "It can hardly be contended that there is not some nuisance even now, but I do not think that the situation is so intolerable for plaintiff, or his alleged injury so irremediable in its nature, as to create a necessity to anticipate the regular formal disposition at the hearing."

Cotton gin.

In Gose v. Coryell (1910) 59 Tex. Civ. App. 504, 126 S. W. 1164, a proceeding to restrain the operation of a cotton gin, the court held that where the severe relief of injunction is sought it must appear, in addition to the proof ordinarily necessary to establish the existence of a nuisance, that the defendant is acting unreasonably; and that the question of the reasonableness of his conduct is a question of fact to be determined from the testimony tending to show the expense or loss of abandoning the gin or removing it to some other locality free from similar objections by adjacent owners, and whether or not such other locality can be had at all.

In Hamm v. Gunn (1908) 51 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 118 S. W. 304, it appeared that a cotton gin had been in operation only for a short time, and that but a few bales of cotton had been ginned. It was held that the evidence was too inconclusive and unsatisfactory to support a decree restraining the operation of the business. The court said: "It appears that at the time of the trial but few bales of cotton had been ginned at all, and the foregoing is substantially all of the testimony on the subject. In our judgment, the evidence is altogether too inconclusive and unsatisfactory to support the decree. The right to abate nuisance is a well-established doctrine of courts of equity, for it is a maxim of our law that the owner of property must so use it as not to materially injure another. But it cannot be successfully contended that a gin is a nuisance per se."

Limekiln.

In Hutchins v. Smith (1872) 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 251, the plaintiff prayed for an injunction restraining the further operation, running, or using of limekilns. It was held that this was too broad, since the kilns were harmless, and the use of them alone was to be restrained. The court said: "The plaintiff demands, in his prayer, an injunction restraining the defendants 'from further running, operating, or using said limekilns.' The language is too broad. The kilns are harmless; it is the use of them in the manner mentioned which is to be restrained. Possibly they may be used in such a way as not to interfere with the plaintiff's rights."

Marble-polishing plant.

In Butterfield v. Klaber (1876) 52 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 255, a proceeding to enjoin the use on adjoining premises of machinery adapted to the polishing of marble, it became material whether marble dust constituted a nuisance. It was held on this point that there was not a sufficient annoyance produced by the dust to warrant the intervention of a court of equity. The court said: "I must find as a fact in the case that the operation of such machinery does not produce a dust whereby any portion of the plaintiff's premises is rendered unfit for habitation."

Sheddy mill.

In Davis v. Whitney (1894) 68 N. H. 66, 44 Atl. 78, it appeared that the plaintiff was damaged by lint, dust, and smoke of a sickening odor, created by a shoddy mill operated by defendant. The substances complained of obliged her to keep her windows and doors shut, and on several occasions she was compelled to absent herself from the house for a period of several weeks. The referee having found that the use of the defendant's lands was reasonable, the court impliedly held that the substances complained of did not constitute a nuisance.

Stone-cutting plant.

In Oakley v. Webb (1916) 38 Ont. L. Rep. 151, 33 D. L. R. 35, it appeared that by reason of the business of stone cutting being carried on, on adjoining premises, the complainants were annoyed by the noise and dust. The trial judge having found that neither the noise nor dust constituted a nuisance, the complainants appealed. It was held, dismissing the appeal, that for a person to carry on a business is a legal right, and so it is for another to enjoy his premises, and in order to show that a business amounts to nuisance it must be shown that in the exercise of his right to carry on the business he invaded the right of the one complaining. The court said: "The right of the respondent to carry on his business is a legal right; so is that of the appellant and his family to enjoy their life in reasonable comfort. To enjoin the respondent, it is necessary to show that in the exercise of his right he wrongfully invades that of the appellant; in other words, that his business is so carried on as to amount to a nuisance, and so is an unlawful invasion of the competing right of the appellant. The character of the neighborhood is an important element in determining the standard of comfort which may be insisted upon."

III. Anticipatory nuisance from dust.

Where the erection of a building for the purpose of carrying on a business is sought to be restrained because of the likelihood that a nuisance will result from the dust, dirt, lint, or sand, or the like, caused by the business, it must appear beyond a reasonable doubt that these substances are necessarily incidental to the business, and due regard must be given to the character of the community. Rouse v. Martin (1883) 75 Ala. 510, 51 Am. Rep. 463; Robinson v. Dale (1910) 62 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 131 S. W. 308; Moore v. Coleman (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 936; Rogers v. John Week Lumber Co. (1903) 117 Wis. 5, 93 N. W. 821.

In Rouse v. Martin (Ala.) supra, a bill to restrain the erection of a structure to be used as a cotton gin, it was alleged that the atmosphere would be rendered impure and unwholesome by the smoke, dust, and small particles of lint, cotton, and other substances incidental to such business. It was held, in dissolving an injunction, that a very strong case must be presented in order to obtain an injunction for an anticipated nuisance, and that, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the probable effect of an alleged nuisance, the courts will not interfere until there has been a test of the use of the property. The facts presented by the bill, it was held, were not such as to authorize the court to allow an injunction. The court said: "Where the injury complained of is not a nuisance per se, but may become so by reason of circumstances—being uncertain, indefinite, or contingent—equity, as we have said, will not interfere. . . . A very strong case must, therefore, be made by the bill, and if there be a reasonable doubt as to the probable effect of an alleged nuisance, either on the proof, affidavits, or on the construction of the facts stated in the bill, there will be no interference until the matter is tested by experiment in the actual use of the property. . . .

Smoke, offensive odors, or disagreeable noise and vibration may, of course, constitute a nuisance so imperiling the comfort of one's existence, his health, or the safety of his property, as to call for injunctive relief at the hands of a court of equity. This is upon the principle that if one makes an unreasonable or unlawful use of his property, 'so as to produce material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt to his neighbor, he will be guilty of a nuisance to his neighbor.' Campbell v. Seaman (1875) 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567. It is just sequence of the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." In determining the question of interference, the court will look at the facts which are stated in the bill, giving little or no weight to the mere opinion of the complainant that they will constitute a nuisance, unless such a conclusion clearly follows by proper inference from these facts. So, of the denials of the answer, on a motion to dissolve an injunction which may have been granted. Catlin v. Valentine (1842) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 575, 38 Am. Dec. 567, 1 High, Inj. § 790. Let us briefly apply the foregoing principles to this case. It is clear that the building sought to be erected by the defendants cannot be regarded as a nuisance, but only the use to which it is to be devoted. This is admitted to be a useful business, which is common to the country, and one which should not be discouraged by too ready an interference by the strong arm of the courts. Taking the facts as alleged in complainants' bill, and discarding all allegations which may properly be regarded as mere matters of opinion, and keeping in view that the injury sought to be prevented is merely apprehended by anticipation, and must, therefore, be a matter greatly of speculation, we cannot say that the chancellor has come to an erroneous conclusion. We do not clearly see that it is not reasonably possible for the business to be conducted so as not to be a nuisance."

was instituted to restrain the erection and operation of a proposed cotton gin, because the complainant's property would be injured by reason of dust, lint, smoke, and the like. It was held, in dissolving an injunction, that a cotton gin was not per se a nuisance, and that the burden of proving that the particular gin that was proposed to be built would be a nuisance was on the complainant. The court said: "The construction and operation of a cotton gin near private residences is not per se a nuisance, and we think the burden was upon appellees to show that the particular kind of gin appellants proposed to construct, when constructed as appellants proposed to construct it, would cause, when operated near private residences, the annoyances appellees anticipated. Testimony that other kinds of cotton gins, constructed in a different way, when so operated, caused such annoyances, did not, we think, tend to show that the gin appellants proposed to build, when operated, would cause them." The court further held that, although the courts will not restrain an act or operation which may become a nuisance, if, after the operation of the gin, it becomes a nuisance by reason of the dust, lint, sand, smoke, and the like, then the court will restrain its further operation, saying: "If, in the actual operation of the gin after it has been constructed as proposed, it should thereafter be made to appear that on account of noise, vibration, dust, cotton lint, or smoke therefrom appellees are deprived of the comfortable enjoyment of their respective homes, they may be entitled to relief by injunction, as well as to a recovery of such damages as they are able to show that they have thereby suffered."

But in Moore v. Coleman (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 936, the suit was instituted to restrain the erection of a proposed cotton gin. The ground on which the bill was founded was stated to be that, by reason of dust, dirt, sand, and lint, the gin would render the use of neighboring homes and churches intolerable, and would injure and destroy the vegetation and trees thereabouts. It was held, in affirming an injunction, that a cotton gin was not per se a nuisance, but may become such by reason of noise, dust, dirt, sand, and the like caused thereby. The court said: "It is true that the authorities hold that a cotton gin is not a nuisance per se, but may become so by reason of the manner or place of its operation. . . . But a cotton gin which causes noise, vibration, dust, and cotton lint, or smoke, so that owners are deprived of the comfortable enjoyment of their homes, is . . . a nuisance. . . . It may be laid down broadly, as a general rule, that any act, omission, or use of property that results in polluting the atmosphere with noxious or offensive odors, gases, or vapors, thereby producing material discomfort and annoyances to those residing in the vicinity, or injuring their health or property, is a nuisance. Ft. Worth v. Crawford (1889) 74 Tex. 404, 15 Am. St. Rep. 840, 12 S. W. 52. Wood, Nuisances, 1883 ed. § 3. While it is not every use to which property is devoted, causing incidental discomfort and annoyance to those residing in the vicinity, that will give rise to the right of injunction in order to abate it, yet the surrounding circumstances, the location of the alleged nuisance, the necessity vel non of the objectionable features of the use, will be considered by the courts in order to determine the right and propriety of granting the relief prayed."

In Rogers v. John Week Lumber Co. (1903) 117 Wis. 5, 93 N. W. 821, it appeared that it was proposed to erect a planing mill in a residential section. The suit was instituted to enjoin such erection. A temporary injunction had been denied. An answer had been interposed, and on the trial the defendant interposed a demurrer ore tenus. The demurrer was sustained on the ground that the denial of the temporary injunction was an adjudication. In reversing the judgment, the court held that there was no adjudication, and further held that, while a planing mill is not a nuisance per se, it may become so by reason of dust, dirt, smoke, and noise, saying: "Doubtless the trial court was right in stating that a planing mill is not a nuisance per se, but it is equally clear that an industry which is not a nuisance per se may be shown to be conducted in such a manner or in such a place as to be in fact a nuisance. . . . Does the complaint before us state facts showing that such an injury is threatened to the plaintiff? We think it does. It states, in substance, that the mill is to be located in a residence portion of the city, within 90 feet of plaintiff's dwelling; that its operation will necessarily create a great amount of steam, dust, dirt, smoke, and noise, which will penetrate plaintiff's house, making it necessary to keep his windows and doors closed at all times, and rendering his home unfit to live in. We think these allegations are sufficient to bring the case within the rules above cited."

UNIONE AUSTRIACA DI NAVIGAZIONE, etc.

United States Supreme Court—November 4, 1913.

Appeal — entry of United States into war — effect on litigation.

1. The changed conditions consequent upon the entrance of the United States into the European War since the rendition below of a decree which affirmed the dismissal without prejudice, upon grounds of expediency, of a libel in personam, filed after the British declaration of war, by a British corporation against an Austro-Hungarian corporation, to recover for coal supplied to the latter's steamers before the war, at Algiers, a dependency of the French Republic, supported by an attachment of one of such vessels, necessitate the setting aside of the decree dismissing the libel and the remanding of the cause for further proceedings, subject to the condition that no action be taken below (except such, if any, as may be required to preserve the security and the rights of the parties in statu quo) until, by the restoration of peace between the United States and Austria-Hungary, or otherwise, it may become possible for the respondent to present its defense adequately.

PETITION for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, to review a decree which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the Eastern District of New York, dismissing without prejudice a libel in personam, filed after the British declaration of war, by petitioner, to recover for coal supplied to respondent's steamers before the war, at Algiers, supported by an attachment of one of such vessels. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John M. Woolsey, J. Parker Kirlin, and Cletus Keating for petitioner.

Messrs. Charles S. Haight and Clarence Bishop for respondent.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 4, 1914, Great Britain declared war against Germany, and on August 12, 1914, against Austria-Hungary. Prior to August 4, Watts, Watts, & Company, Limited, a British corporation, had supplied to Unione Austriaca di Navigazione, an Austro-Hungarian corporation, bunker coal at Algiers, a dependency of the French Republic. Drafts on London given therefor having been protested for nonpayment, the seller brought, on August 24, 1914, a libel in personam against the purchaser in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York. Jurisdiction was obtained by attaching one of the steamers to which the coal had been furnished. The attachment was discharged by giving a bond which is now in force. The respondent appeared and filed an answer which admitted that the case was within the admiralty jurisdiction of the court; and it was submitted for decision upon a stipulation as to facts and proof of foreign law.

The respondent contended that the district court, as a court of a neutral nation, should not exercise its jurisdictional power between alien belligerents to require the transfer, by process of judgment and execution, of funds by one alien belligerent to another,—an act which it alleged was prohibited alike by the municipal law of both belligerents. The libellant replied that performance of the contract by respondent, that is, the payment of a debt due, was legal by the law of the place of performance, whether that place be taken to be Algiers or London; that it was immaterial whether it was legal by the Austro-Hungarian law, since Austria-Hungary was not the place of performance; and that the enforcement of legal rights here would not infringe the attitude of impartiality which underlies neutrality. The district court held that it had jurisdiction of the controversy, and that it was within its discretion to determine whether it should exercise the jurisdiction; since both parties were aliens and the cause of action arose and was to be performed abroad. It then dismissed the libel without prejudice, saying: "From the standpoint of this neutral jurisdiction the controlling consideration is that the law of both belligerent countries [Great Britain and Austria-Hungary] forbids a payment by one belligerent subject to his enemy during the continuance of war. This court, in the exercise of jurisdiction founded on comity, may not ignore that state of war and disregard the consequences resulting from it." 224 Fed. 188, 194.

The dismissal by the district court was entered on May 27, 1915. On December 14, 1915, the decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, on the ground that it was within the discretion of the trial court to determine whether to take or to decline jurisdiction (The Belgenland, 114 U. S. 355, 29 L. ed. 152, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 860), and that the exercise of this discretion should not be interfered with, since no abuse was shown (143 C. C. A. 412, 229 Fed. 136). On June 12, 1916, an application for leave to file a petition for writ of mandamus to compel the court of appeals to review the exercise of discretion by the district court was denied (241 U. S. 655, 60 L. ed. 1224, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 726), and a writ of certiorari was granted by this court (241 U. S. 677, 60 L. ed. 1232, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 726). The certiorari and return were filed July 21, 1916. On December 7, 1917, the President issued a proclamation declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and Austria-Hungary. The case was argued here on April 17, 1918.

This court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, has power not only to correct error in the judgment entered below, but to make such disposition of the case as justice may at this time require.

Appeal—rendering proper judgment—changed conditions.

Butler v. Eaton, 141 U. S. 240, 35 L. ed. 713, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dennis, 224 U. S. 503, 506, 56 L. ed. 860, 861, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542. And in determining what justice now requires, the court must consider the changes in fact and in law which have supervened since the decree was entered below. United States v. Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt-Actien Gesellschaft, 239 U. S. 466, 475, 478, 60 L. ed. 387, 391, 392, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 212; Berry v. Davis, 242 U. S. 468, 61 L. ed. 441, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 208; Jones v. Montague, 194 U. S. 147, 48 L. ed. 913, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611; Dinsmore v. Southern Exp. Co. 183 U. S. 115, 120, 46 L. ed. 111, 113, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 45; Mills v. Green, 159 U. S. 651, 40 L. ed. 293, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132; The Rachel v. United States, 6 Cranch, 329, 3 L. ed. 239; United States v. The Peggy, 1 Cranch, 103, 109, 110, 2 L. ed. 49–51. In the case at bar the rule is the more insistent, because, in admiralty, cases are tried de novo on appeal. Yeaton v. United States, 5 Cranch, 281, 3 L. ed. 101; Irvine v. The Hesper, 122 U. S. 256, 266, 30 L. ed. 1175, 1178, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177; Reid v. Fargo, 241 U. S. 544, 60 L. ed. 1156, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712.

Since the certiorari was granted, the relation of the parties to the court has changed radically. Then, as earlier, the proceeding was one between alien belligerents in a court of a neutral nation. Now, it is a suit by one belligerent in a court of a cobelligerent against a common enemy. A suit may be brought in our courts against an alien enemy. McVeigh v. United States, 11 Wall. 259, 267, 20 L. ed. 80, 81. See also Dorsey v. Kyle, 30 Md. 512, 96 Am. Dec. 617. If the libel had been filed under existing circumstances, security for the claim being obtained by attachment, probably no American court would, in the exercise of discretion, dismiss it and thus deprive the libellant not only of its security, but perhaps of all possibility of ever obtaining satisfaction. Under existing circumstances dismissal of the libel is not consistent with the demands of justice.

The respondent, although an alien enemy, is, of course, entitled to defend before a judgment should be entered. McVeigh v. United States, supra. See also Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 280, 23 L. ed. 914, 916; Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 841. It is now represented by counsel. But intercourse is prohibited by law between subjects of Austria-Hungary outside the United States and persons in the United States. Trading with the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, § 3 (c) [40 Stat. at L. 411, chap. 106, Comp. Stat. —, § 3115½b], Public—No. 91—65th Congress. And we take notice of the fact that free intercourse between residents of the two countries has been also physically impossible. It is true that, more than three years ago, a stipulation as to the facts and the proof of foreign law was entered into by the then counsel for respondent, who has died since. But reasons may conceivably exist why that stipulation ought to be discharged or modified, or why it should be supplemented by evidence. We cannot say that, for the proper conduct of the defense, consultation between client and counsel and intercourse between their respective countries may not be essential even at this stage. The war precludes this.

Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the decree dismissing the libel should be set aside and the case remanded to the District Court for further proceedings, but that no action should be taken there (except such, if any, as may be required to preserve the security and the rights of the parties in statu quo) until, by reason of the restoration of peace between the United States and Austria-Hungary, or otherwise, it may become possible for the respondent to present its defense adequately. ## I. In courts of first instance.

a. Where plaintiff is an enemy subject resident in the enemy's country.

The general rule is that an alien enemy, resident in his own country, may not prosecute an action instituted before the commencement of the war. Bell v. Chapman (1813) 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 183; Rothbarth v. Herzfeld (1917) 179 App. Div. 865, 167 N. Y. Supp. 199, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 223 N. Y. 578, 119 N. E. 1075; Panee v. Soler (1917) 101 Misc. 693, 167 N. Y. Supp. 901; Nord Deutsche Ins. Co. v. John L. Dudley Jr. Co. (1918) 169 N. Y. Supp. 303, affirmed in (1918) — App. Div. —, 169 N. Y. Supp. 1106; Hungarian General Credit-bank v. Titus (1918) 182 App. Div. 826, 169 N. Y. Supp. 926; Currie v. The Josiah Harthorn (1862) Fed. Cas. No. 3,491a; Speidel v. N. Barstow Co. (1917) 243 Fed. 621; Le Bret v. Papillon (1804) 4 East, 502, 102 Eng. Reprint, 923, 7 Revised Rep. 618; Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 155, 31 Times L. R. 20, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 238, 20 Com. Cas. 125, 112 L. T. N. S. 125, [1914] W. N. 393, 59 Sol. Jo. 7; Porter v. Freudenberg [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 857, 5 B. R. C. 548, W. N. 43, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1001, 112 L. T. N. S. 313, 31 Times L. R. 162, 59 Sol. Jo. 216, 20 Com. Cas. 189, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 215; Canadian Stewart Co. v. Perih (1915) Rap. Jud.

So, a suit instituted by a corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country, and doing business there, will be stayed, where, during its pendency, war broke out between such country and that of the forum. Hungarian General Creditbank v. Titus (1918) 182 App. Div. 826, 169 N. Y. Supp. 926; Nord Deutsche Ins. Co. v. John L. Dudley Jr. Co. (1918) 169 N. Y. Supp. 303, affirmed in (1918) — App. Div. —, 169 N. Y. Supp. 1106.

One view as to the reason for such disability is expressed in Sparenburgh v. Bannatyne (1797) 1 Bos. & P. 163, 126 Eng. Reprint, 837, in which it was said by Eyre, Ch. J.: "I take the true ground upon which the plea of alien enemy has been allowed is that a man professing himself hostile to this country, and in a state of war with it, cannot be heard if he sue for the benefit and protection of our laws in the courts of this country. We do not allow even our own subjects to demand the benefit of the law in our courts, if they refuse to submit to the law and the jurisdiction of our courts. Such is the case of an outlaw."

But the true reason seems to be that stated in Viola v. Mackenzie (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 24 B. R. 31, 24 D. L. R. 208, where it is said that the restriction of a right to sue does not result from the incapacity of the foreigner, but from the fact that the enemy country will profit by executing a judgment in his favor.

So, also, in 1 Bacon, Abridgment, "Aliens," D, it is said: "By the policy of the law alien enemies shall not be admitted to actions to recover effects which may be carried out of the Kingdom, to weaken ourselves and enrich the enemy."

The modern tendency is toward a relaxation of the severity of the general rule above stated, and the standing in court of an enemy plaintiff is generally recognized. The courts will permit him to take such action as may be necessary to preserve his rights, though he may not enforce them where the effect will be to augment the enemy resources.

Effect of Hague Convention.

The common-law rule by which an alien enemy is precluded from enforcing his right of action during the continuance of war is not abrogated by article 23 (h) of chapter 1, § 2, of the Annex to the Hague Convention of 1907, by which it is forbidden to "declare abolished, suspended, or inadmissible the right of the subjects of the hostile party to institute legal proceedings;" but such provision is, in view of its collocation, to be read as forbidding any declaration by the military commander of a belligerent force in the occupation of the enemy's country, which will prevent the inhabitants of that territory from using their courts of law in order to assert or protect their civil rights. Porter v. Freudenberg [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 857, 5 B. R. C. 548, W. N. 43, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1001, 112 L. T. N. S. 318, 31 Times L. R. 162, 59 Sol. Jo. 216, 20 Com. Cas. 189, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 215.

Effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917.

The Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917 does not permit the prosecution by a nonresident alien enemy, of any suits in the courts during the war, except in cases provided in such act. Hungarian General Creditbank v. Titus (1918) 182 App. Div. 826, 169 N. Y. Supp. 926.

Subsection a of § 5 of the Trading with the Enemy Act, which provides, among other things, that the President may grant licenses, special or general, temporary or otherwise, and for such period of time and containing such provisions and conditions as he shall prescribe, to any person or class of persons, to do business as provided in subsection a of § 4 of the act, and to perform any acts made unlawful, without such license, by sections of the act, does not authorize the granting of a license to prosecute a suit. Ibid.

Where enemy subject is the real party in interest.

The disability of a nonresident alien enemy to sue extends to suits in which a nonresident enemy is the real party in interest. Thus, an action is not maintainable by an agent on behalf of his principal, where the principal is an alien enemy (Brandon v. Nesbitt (1794) 6 T. R. 23, 101 Eng. Reprint, 415, 3 Revised Rep. 109, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 649), or by a trustee for the benefit of an alien enemy (Crawford v. The William Penn (1815) Pet. C. C. 106, Fed. Cas. No. 3,372), as the public policy which forbids that the property sued for should be carried out of the country to enrich the enemy would be violated equally in the one case as in the other. It has, however, been held that it is no defense to an action that the plaintiff sued in trust for an alien enemy (Daubuz v. Morshead (1815) 6 Taunt. 332, 128 Eng. Reprint 1062, 16 Revised Rep. 623); doubtless on the theory that the ground of the objection goes rather to the enforcement of the judgment than to the maintenance of the suit.

That the plaintiffs in an action, who, since its institution, have become alien enemies, had, long prior to the war, assigned the cause of action to trustees for the benefit of certain creditors some of whom were resident in the state of the forum, does not prevent a suspension of the prosecution of the action, where the assignment expressly provided that the trustees should have no voice in its conduct or settlement, and it appears that they would be required to distribute the bulk of the proceeds of the judgment, after paying the domestic creditors, to alien enemies. Rothbarth v. Herzfeld (1917) 179 App. Div. 865, 167 N. Y. Supp. 199, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 223 N. Y. 578, 119 N. E. 1075.

So, an action for wrongful death cannot be maintained by the administrator of a decedent, where the persons for whose benefit the action is given are alien enemies. Dangler v. Hollinger Gold Mines (1915) 34 Ont. L. Rep. 78.

But in Weiditschka v. Supreme Tent-

K. M. (1919) — Iowa, —, 170 N. W. 300, it was held that an action brought by an administrator to enforce a benefit certificate issued to his decedent will not be postponed until the termination of the war because of the enemy character of the heirs, in as much as the administrator is under the control of the court, and may be directed by it to retain the fund for distribution after the termination of the war.

And in Krachanake v. Acme Mfg. Co. (1918) 175 N. C. 435, L.R.A.1918E, 801, 95 S. E. 851, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 340, it was suggested that the reasons which prevent alien enemies, under certain conditions, from resorting to our courts, do not prevail where the subject of the recovery will be in charge of a guardian appointed by the court, and cannot be removed from the state without the consent of the court, so that the danger of its being used to strengthen the hands of the enemy is entirely removed.

But the fact that one of the plaintiffs, who is merely a nominal party, and who cannot control the suit nor collect the judgment, is a public enemy, is no ground for dismissing the petition of the beneficial plaintiff, who is not an enemy. Hoskins v. Gentry (1865) 2 Duv. (Ky.) 285; Mercedes Daimler Motor Co. v. Maudslay Motor Co. [1915] 31 Times L. R. (Eng.) 178, 32 Rep. Pat. Cas. 149, [1915] W. N. 54.

An action will not be dismissed where it is shown that the alien enemy is only a nominal plaintiff, or the coplaintiff of a nonbelligerent who is a substantial plaintiff, or a denizen or inhabitant of the United States. Stumpf v. A. Schreiber Brewing Co. (1917) 242 Fed. 80 (dictum).

Where enemy subject is one of two or more plaintiffs.

Where it is pleaded in abatement that one of the plaintiffs is an alien enemy, the other plaintiff may move to amend his writ by striking out the name of his coplaintiff. Arnold v. Sergeant (1783) 1 Root (Conn.) 86.

But a suit asserting an indivisible right, such as a suit for the infringement of a patent, brought by a partnership, some of the members of which are alien enemies resident in the enemy's country, will not be dismissed as to the nonresident plaintiffs, but will be stayed during the continuance of the war. Speidel v. N. Barstow Co. (1917) 243 Fed. 621.

Actions for preservation of existing rights.

It has been held that an action for the preservation of the rights of the complainants as stockholders in a domestic corporation, and also in the interest of the corporation for the protection of its rights against the action of the defendants, will not be stayed upon the ground that the complainants are alien enemies, in the absence of anything to show that the legitimate interests of the United States will be thereby affected. Posselt v. D'Espard (1917) 87 N. J. Eq. 571, 100 Atl. 893.

Mode of disposal of pending suit.

The weight of authority is to the effect that, where an action has been commenced before the war, the proceeding is only suspended. See

Unless the action itself ought not to be maintained. Weiditschka v. Supreme Tent, K. M. (Iowa) supra.

In other cases it has been held that, where the plaintiffs become alien enemies subsequently to the institution of the suit, the action should be dismissed rather than continued on the docket. Howes v. Chester (1861) 33 Ga. 89; Dumenko v. Swift Canadian Co. (1914) 32 Ont. L. Rep. 87.

These decisions, however, are not generally regarded as sound. In Weiditschka v. Supreme Tent, K. M. (1919) — Iowa, —, 170 N. W. 300, it is said that the authority of Howes v. Chester (Ga.) supra, is considerably impaired, since it turned out that there was no alien enemy involved—citing Texas v. White (1869) 7 Wall. (U. S.) 700, 19 L. ed. 227. It is also pointed out by Judge Speer in Plattenburg v. Kalmon (1917) 241 Fed. 605, that the opinion must be regarded as academic. And Boyd, C., in Luczycki v. Spanish River Pulp & Paper Mills Co. (1915) 34 Ont. L. Rep. 549, said that the Dumenko Case (Ont.) supra, is founded on Le Bret v. Papillon (1804) 4 East, 502, 102 Eng. Reprint, 923, 7 Revised Rep. 618, and Brandon v. Nesbitt (1794) 6 T. R. 23, 101 Eng. Reprint, 415, 3 Revised Rep. 109, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 649, but that “in Brandon v. Nesbitt the plaintiff was an alien enemy at the outset, and so was never rightly in court. Le Bret v. Papillon is in point, for there the action was rightly brought, but its course was intercepted by declaration of war. The defendant's contention was made by way of dilatory plea, and the judgment was that the plaintiff should be barred from further having and maintaining the action. Nothing is said as to costs, and in form the action was not dismissed. In the Dumenko Case, the judgment may well be rested on the fact that the plaintiff was in default in giving security for costs. By the order, if security was not given the action was to be dismissed. The plaintiff, the alien enemy, moved to obtain an extension of time, which favor will not be granted to an alien enemy, and the action was well dismissed with costs.”

The fact that an action brought by a plaintiff resident in the enemy's country cannot be prosecuted during the period of the war will not excuse the failure, upon the death of the plaintiff, promptly to substitute his personal representative. Farenholtz v. Meinshausen (1918) 181 App. Div. 474, 168 N. Y. Supp. 869.

In this case, however, the court took into consideration the difficulty of communication between this country and Germany, by allowing a period of one year for the substitution of the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff.

It has been held that the fact that since the institution of the action the plaintiff therein has become an alien enemy may be made the basis of a motion to dismiss, and need not be set up by a supplemental answer as one of the issues in the case. Rothbarth v. Herzfeld (1917) 179 App. Div. 865, 167 N. Y. Supp. 199, reversing (1917) 100 Misc. 470, 166 N. Y. Supp. 744.

Right to make claim against bankrupt's estate.

The right to recover a debt being only suspended during, and not extinguished by, the war, an alien enemy may make a claim in a bankruptcy proceeding, though dividends thereon will be withheld until the conclusion of peace. Ex parte Boussmaker (1806) 13 Ves. Jr. 71, 38 Eng. Reprint, 221, 9 Revised Rep. 142.

But an alien enemy resident in the enemy's country cannot be heard, during the war, to complain of the rejection of a claim filed by him against a bankrupt's estate. Re Wilson (1915) 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 1893, [1915] Hansell, Bankr. R. 189.

Whether plaintiff's disability may be waived.

Although there is some conflict of opinion, the better view appears to be that the disability to sue, arising from the fact that the plaintiff is an alien enemy, may not be waived, the objection not being a matter of privilege in the defendant, but being based upon considerations of public policy, of which the court should be held bound to take notice.

Thus, in Jansen v. Driefontein Consol. Mines [1902] A. C. (Eng.) 484, 5 B. R. C. 810, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 857, 87 L. T. N. S. 372, 18 Times L. R. 796, 7 Com. Cas. 268, Lord Davey observed that he had some doubt whether the objection of alien enemy might be waived, it being one based on considerations of public policy, of which the court should be held bound to take notice. This dictum is cited with approval in Bassi v. Sullivan (1914) 32 Ont. L. Rep. 14; and a similar doubt was expressed in Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 155, 31 Times L. R. 20, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 238, 20 Com. Cas. 125, 112 L. T. N. S. 125, [1914] W. N. 393, 59 Sol. Jo. 7.

And in Dorsey v. Kyle (1869) 30 Md. 512, 96 Am. Dec. 617, it is said that the plea of alien enemy is not a matter of privilege, but a disability that suspends the right to maintain an action in the courts of the country to which the party is an enemy.

So, also, it has been held that where, during the pendency of an action, the plaintiff becomes an alien enemy, the court has no legal power to render judgment (Brooke v. Filer (1871) 35 Ind. 402); and that a decree rendered in a cause instituted before the commencement of war, the parties to which resided on opposite sides of the military line, and were consequently enemies to each other, is without legal validity. Stephens v. Brown (1884) 24 W. Va. 234.

But the error, if any, in permitting an action brought by an alien enemy to proceed to judgment, becomes immaterial where peace has been concluded. Bishop v. Jones (1866) 28 Tex. 294.

The view that the disability to sue, arising from the fact that the plaintiff is an alien enemy, may be waived, is supported by McNair v. Toler (1875) 21 Minn. 175, where the action was instituted before the war, and in which it was held that the objection that the plaintiff was technically an alien enemy, like all other objections to his capacity to sue, was waived by the omission to plead it in abatement.

And in Barna v. Gleason Coal & Coke Co. (1919) — W. Va. —, 98 S. E. 158, the statement is made in the syllabus by the court that "the fact that plaintiff is an alien enemy is defensive, and ordinarily unavailing without timely plea;" but the point cannot be regarded as having been necessarily decided, inasmuch as the plaintiff was a resident alien.

In Heiler v. Goodman's Motor Exp. Van & Storage Co. (N. J.) post, 336, it was held that the defense of alien enemy, in order to be considered in an action at law, should be made a part of the record, and stated with accuracy by an appropriate pleading or motion; and that it is not favored by intendment.

And see also Burnside v. Matthews (1873) 54 N. Y. 78, where it was said that as the defense was merely technical and dilatory, growing out of a supposed temporary disability, it must, to be effectual, be pleaded specially and with certainty, to a particular intent.

It should, perhaps, be pointed out that these decisions, while permitting the recovery of judgment in the absence of objection duly taken, are in no wise inconsistent with the view that the court may, of its own motion, refuse process for its enforcement during the war.

Effect of restoration of peace.

A plea of alien enemy is defeated by the conclusion of a treaty of peace (Johnson v. Harrison (1815) Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 226); and a suit, not being abated during the war, cannot be abated after the conclusion of peace (Hamersley v. Lambert (1817) 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 508).

Intervention by alien enemy property custodian.

An alien enemy custodian appointed by the President under the Trading with the Enemy Act may intervene, and take over and continue the prosecution of an action instituted by one who has become an alien enemy. Rothbarth v. Herzfeld (1917) 179 App. Div. 865, 167 N. Y. Supp. 199.

An action instituted by a corporation of enemy nationality, before the outbreak of war, will be stayed upon motion, notwithstanding a delay may greatly impair the remedy; but the alien enemy custodian may, if he sees fit to do so, intervene, and take over and continue the prosecution of the action. Nord Deutsche Ins. Co. v. John L. Dudley Jr. Co. (1918) 169 N. Y. Supp. 303, affirmed in (1918) — App. Div. —, 169 N. Y. Supp. 1106.

Right to enforce judgment.

The court will refuse to dissolve an injunction against the enforcement of a judgment where, since the injunction was obtained, the judgment creditors have become alien enemies. Taylor v. Morgan (1812) 2 Mart. (La.) 263.

Where the plaintiff has obtained a decision in his favor before the outbreak of a war which rendered him an alien enemy, the court will not sign or enter a decree, but will suspend proceedings until the restoration of peace. Stumpf v. A. Schreiber Brewing Co. (1917) 242 Fed. 80.

Where the plaintiff in a suit becomes an alien enemy after judgment, the court will not, on motion, stay or set aside the execution, but the defendant may avail himself of his remedy at law. Vanbrynen v. Wilson (1808) 9 East, 321, 103 Eng. Reprint, 596; Buckley v. Lyttle (1813) 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 117.

b. Where plaintiff is an enemy subject resident in a neutral or allied country.

As to whether an enemy subject residing in an allied or neutral country is debarred from prosecuting an action during the continuance of the war, there is a difference of opinion.

In Re Sutherland (1915) 31 Times L. R. (Eng.) 248, it is held that an action can be maintained by a person of enemy nationality, who is neither residing nor carrying on business in an enemy country, but resides in either an allied or neutral country, and carries on business through his partners in that allied country.

But in Russel v. Skipwith (1814) 6 Binn. (Pa.) 241, the opinion is expressed that the residence of an alien enemy subject in a neutral country cannot form an exception to the reason or policy of the general principle, "because, if he can withdraw the money into a neutral country, he may readily transfer it from thence into his own country."

The opinion was expressed in a Canadian case, Newman v. Bradshaw (1916) 22 B. C. 420, 28 D. L. R. 769, 33 West. L. R. 945, that a German subject, resident in a neutral country, but not naturalized there, was debarred during the war from seeking redress in a Canadian court; but definite disposition of the motion to set aside the writ was deferred until the trial.

c. Where plaintiff is an enemy subject, but resides in the state of the forum.

The outbreak of war does not affect the right of an enemy subject, resident in the jurisdiction, to continue to prosecute an action. See annotation appended to Heiler v. Goodman's Motor Exp. Van & Storage Co. post, 341.

As to the effect of internment as a civilian prisoner of war upon the right to prosecute a pending suit, see the annotation above referred to.

d. Where an enemy subject is the party defendant.

The reason of policy which suspends the right of action of an alien enemy during the war does not apply where the suit is not by one of the enemy to collect his resources, but by a citizen, to put himself in funds; hence, an action by a resident in the state of the forum, pending at the outbreak of the war or begun since the outbreak of war, may be prosecuted during its continuance, provided, of course, the defendant can be reached by process.

Cas. 1917C, 215; Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. [1915] 1 K. B. 155, 31 Times L. R. 20, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 238, 20 Com. Cas. 125, 112 L. T. N. S. 125, [1914] W. N. 393, 59 Sol. Jo. 7.

But though a nonresident alien enemy may be made a party defendant, he may not, of course, prosecute a counterclaim. Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. (Eng.) supra.

The liability of an alien enemy to be sued carries with it the right to use all the means and appliances of defense. Seymour v. Bailey (1872) 66 Ill. 288; and see also Compagnie Universelle de Telegraphie et de Telephonie Sans Fil v. United States Service Corp. (1915) 84 N. J. Eq. 604, 95 Atl. 187.

He is entitled to appear by attorney, and be heard in his defense. "It would be revolting to the rules of justice which govern a court to drag therein a party, and then say to him, Although you are properly before the court, you are an alien enemy, and shall not be heard, yet judgment shall be rendered against you." Russ v. Mitchell (1864) 11 Fla. 80.

He may appear by attorney to defend proceedings for the confiscation of his property, and may sue out a writ of error. McVeigh v. United States (1871) 11 Wall. (U. S.) 259, 20 L. ed. 80.

There is no rule of the common law which prevents a nonresident alien enemy appearing and conducting his defense. Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 155, [1914] W. N. 93, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 238, 112 L. T. N. S. 125, 31 Times L. R. 20, 59 Sol. Jo. 7, 20 Com. Cas. 125.

He may have a discovery for the purpose of conducting his defense, just as he will be allowed process to compel the attendance of his witnesses. Albretcht v. Sussmann (1813) 2 Ves. & B. 323, 35 Eng. Reprint, 342, 13 Revised Rep. 110.

If hampered in the preparation of his case, in his witnesses, or in other ways, it may, however, be proper to grant a postponement. See remarks in Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. (Eng.) supra.

But it seems that in the event of the defendant's succeeding in the action, no order which will entitle him to payment of costs during the war ought to be made, and his right to issue execution should be suspended until the cessation of the state of hostilities. Robinson v. Continental Ins. Co. (Eng.) supra.

e. War conditions as ground for continuance.

Upon refusing to dismiss a libel in admiralty for repairs to a vessel belonging to a citizen of another country, the court should hold the case, to give the owner of the vessel an opportunity to present his proof, although a state of war exists between his nation and that where the court is sitting. The Kaiser Wilhelm II. (1917) L.R.A.1918C, 795, 159 C. C. A. 88, 246 Fed. 786.

And in City Nat. Bank v. Dresdner Bank (1919) 255 Fed. 225, the court held that it would not undertake to decide a question involving the rights of alien enemies resident in the enemy's country, but would continue the cause until peace should be declared, in order to give them an opportunity to come in and propound their claims, and offer their testimony in support thereof.

In Ax v. Meyer (1917) 179 App. Div. 615, 166 N. Y. Supp. 934, it was held that, by reason of the interference with the means of intercommunication between this country and Holland, arising out of the war, a stay of proceedings pending the execution and return of a commission to take testimony in Holland would not be vacated because of the failure of the plaintiff to take steps to procure the issuance of the commission and the settlement of the interrogatories, on account of his inability to obtain from his assignor in Holland the specific information to enable him to prepare proper interrogatories, unless the defendant would stipulate to concede the matter upon which the taking of such testimony was necessary.

In Kent v. Fraser (1918) 181 App. Div. 813, 168 N. Y. Supp. 1036, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, in denying the defendant's motion for an indefinite postponement of trial on the ground of the absence in Germany of a material witness, who was alleged by the affidavits of the moving party, upon information and belief, to be in the service of the German government and in its army, where it did not appear where the witness was, or whether he was still alive.

The trial court cannot be said to have abused its discretionary power in refusing a continuance in an action brought by one who was subsequently interned as a dangerous alien, where plaintiff had been present at a former trial of the cause, upon which it appeared that the contract, for breach of which he was suing, had been negotiated by his agent, and it did not appear that plaintiff knew much of the facts upon which he relied, and his testimony had been preserved, and was accessible. Lutz v. Van Heynigen Brokerage Co. (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 72.

II. In appellate courts.

The entrance of the United States into the war against Germany and Austria, with the resultant reversal by the Supreme Court, as chronicled in the reported case (WATTS, W. & Co. v. UNIONE AUSTRIACA DI NAVIGAZIONE, ante, 323), of the action of the court below in dismissing the libel, on the ground that the courts of a neutral nation should, in the exercise of jurisdiction founded on comity, decline to entertain an action brought for the purpose of compelling a payment by one belligerent subject to an enemy subject during the continuance of the war, where such a payment is forbidden by the laws of both belligerents, prevented the decision of a question which is stated by the court of first instance to have been presented for judicial determination apparently for the first time.

A similar situation was presented in The Kaiser Wilhelm II. (1917) L.R.A. 1918C, 795, 159 C. C. A. 88, 246 Fed. 786, in which a libel had been filed by a British corporation against a steamship owned by a German corporation, which contended that the Federal court should not exercise its jurisdiction, because the countries of both litigants were at war with each other, and that prior to the filing of the libel the government of Germany had issued a moratorium, whereby payment of all indebtedness by German to British subjects was forbidden during the war. It was therefore contended that the present enforcement of this claim would compel such German subject to violate the law of its country, and thereby subject itself to pains and penalties. On the hearing, the court, in an opinion reported at (1916) 230 Fed. 717, sustained the contention of the German company, and dismissed the libel. Pending an appeal from its decree the whole situation was changed by the existence of war between the United States and Germany, and the taking of the libeled ship by the United States government; and it was accordingly held that the libel should be reinstated, and the case held, to give the owner of the vessel an opportunity to present his proof.

From the failure of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Owens v. Hanney (1813) 9 Cranch (U. S.) 180, 3 L. ed. 697, to accede to the contention of counsel that the court ought not to affirm the judgment, it would seem that, if war breaks out during the pendency of a writ of error, the plaintiff in error cannot take advantage of the fact that the original plaintiff is an alien enemy, but the judgment may be affirmed.

The rights of an appellee are not affected by a change of his status, from that of alien friend to that of alien enemy, since the appeal was perfected. Superior & P. Copper Co. v. Davidovitch (1918) 19 Ariz. 402, 171 Pac. 127, 16 N. C. C. A. 801.

A writ of error to review a judgment in favor of an alien residing in his own country, who became an alien enemy before disposition thereof, need not be held in abeyance; but the judgment, being upheld, should be modified so as to direct payment to the clerk of the court, and by him to be transferred to the alien property custodian; without prejudice, however, to the right of any person not an alien enemy, to establish an interest therein. Birge-Forbes Co. v. Heye (1918) 160 C. C. A. 536, 243 Fed. 636, writ of certiorari granted in (1918) 246 U. S. 676, 62 L. ed. 933, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426.

Where an appellant becomes, by the outbreak of war, an alien enemy during the pendency of an appeal, the appeal will not necessarily be dismissed, but may be held in abeyance. Ozbolt v. Lumbermen's Indemnity Exch. (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 204 S. W. 252.

In Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co. (1917) 176 Cal. 347, L.R.A.1918D, 185, 168 Pac. 348, it was held that an alien enemy may prosecute an appeal from an adverse judgment rendered before the war, where a dismissal of the appeal would be, in effect, an affirmation of the judgment perpetually barring his claim.

But an English case holds that an alien enemy, who is plaintiff in an action commenced before the outbreak of war, has no right of appeal, such right being suspended until the conclusion of peace. Porter v. Freuden- berg [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 857, 5 B. R. C. 548, W. N. 43, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1001, 112 L. T. N. S. 313, 31 Times L. R. 162, 59 Sol. Jo. 216, 20 Com. Cas. 189, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 215.

And see also, to the same effect, Canadian Stewart Co. v. Perih (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 25 B. R. 158, in which it was held that an appellee, who is a nonresident alien enemy, is not to be regarded as having the status in the appellate court of a defendant resisting the demand the appellant makes to have the judgment reversed.

An English case likewise holds that where two coplaintiffs have given notice of appeal before the outbreak of war, and one of them has, on the outbreak of war, become an alien enemy, the appeal must be suspended during the war. Actien-Gesellschaft Für Anilin Fabrikation v. Levinstein (1915) 31 Times L. R. (Eng.) 225, 32 Rep. Pat. Cas. 140, 112 L. T. N. S. 963, [1915] W. N. 85, 84 L. J. Ch. N. S. 842.

Where an alien enemy is a party defendant he may appeal against any decision, final or interlocutory, that may be given against him. Porter v. Freudenberg (Eng.) supra; McVeigh v. United States (1870) 11 Wall. (U. S.) 259, 20 L. ed. 80.

An appeal will not be dismissed because the defendants, or parties in the attitude of defendants, taking the appeal, are nonresident alien enemies. Re Thiede (1918) — Neb. —, 169 N. W. 435.

An alien enemy who is respondent to a petition for revocation of a patent, and against whom the operation of a decree revoking the patent is suspended by an appeal, cannot claim that the hearing of the appeal must be suspended during the war. Porter v. Freudenberg (Eng.) supra.

GOODMAN'S MOTOR EXPRESS VAN & STORAGE COMPANY.

New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—November 18, 1918.

(— N. J. —, 105 Atl. 233.)

Alien — right of enemy to prosecute suit.

1. Plaintiff, a citizen of Germany residing in this state and earning his living here, sued for damages sustained by reason of a collision between his motorcycle and an automobile van. At the trial it appeared that he was born in Germany, had never been naturalized in this country, and was living and working in this state as aforesaid. Held, that it was improper to nonsuit him on the ground that he was an alien enemy, first, because the defense had not been pleaded or otherwise entered upon the record; secondly, because the alien enemy rule is not applicable to a citizen of an enemy country peaceably residing and doing business here with the implied license and permission of our government; there being nothing to show that he was within any of the classes denounced by the Trading with the Enemy Act or any presidential proclamation.

Trial — leave to withdraw juror.

2. Leave to withdraw a juror is a favor, not a right, and rests within the sound discretion of the trial court.

Alien — action — defense.

3. The defense of alien enemy, in order to be considered in an action at law, should be made a part of the record, and stated with accuracy by an appropriate pleading, or motion under our present practice. It is not favored by intendment.

4. No action can be maintained either by or in favor of an alien enemy.

5. A subject of a sovereign with which this country is at war, who resides and conducts business here, is not an alien enemy within the rule that such persons cannot maintain actions in the courts of this country.

Headnotes 1-3 by PARKER, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit by the Supreme Court of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of defendant's automobile van. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John Winans for appellant.

Mr. Randolph Perkins for appellee.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit was to recover damages for personal injuries claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff below, by reason of a collision between a motorcycle on which plaintiff was riding and an automobile van belonging to and operated by a servant or servants of the defendant. At the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited on the sole ground that he was an alien enemy of the United States, and was therefore barred from maintaining an action. This is urged as error, and also that the court refused the application of the plaintiff, when the question of nonsuit was under consideration and argument, to withdraw a juror and award a mistrial.

The alienage of the plaintiff was not made to appear until the latter part of his cross-examination, and it is worth while to quote, at this point, the exact testimony in that regard:

Q. You say—where were you born, Mr Heiler?

A. What's that?

Q. Where were you born?

A. Germany.

Q. When?

A. August 16, 1895.

Q. Are you a naturalized American citizen?

A. No, sir.

Q. So you were born in Germany?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are not an American citizen?

A. No, sir.

This seems to be everything in the testimony upon the point. The alienage and enmity of plaintiff were not in any manner set up in the pleadings, nor was any application made at the trial to amend the answer or place this defense upon the record by a special motion as provided by the Practice Act of 1912 (Act March 28, 1912 [Pamph. Laws, 377]). The motion was made as a motion to nonsuit, purely incidental to the progress of the trial upon a complete record.

The alleged error of the court in refusing to withdraw a juror may be dismissed in a few words, and, indeed, is in no way essential to the determination of the main question now involved, although it is worth while to advert to it as a matter of practice. The general rule, as laid down recently by this court, is that the refusal to withdraw a juror and thereby produce a mistrial is a matter that rests in the discretion of the trial judge, and is not assignable for error. Bradley v. D. E. Cleary Co. 86 N. J. L. 338, 90 Atl. 1015. The same rule obtains in New York, where it has been said by the court of appeals of that state that "leave to withdraw a juror is a favor, not a right, and has always been held to rest within the sound discretion of the court." Cattano v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 173 N. Y. 565, 572, 66 N. E. 565, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 566; Chesebrough v. Conover, 140 N. Y. 382, 388, 35 N. E. 633, 635. Conceding for present purposes that exceptional circumstances might remove the case from the operation of this rule, we find nothing in the case at bar to justify such a course.

to withdraw juror.

With respect to the granting of the motion to nonsuit, however, we consider that there was clear error, and this for two reasons: First, because the issue was not raised upon the pleadings; and secondly, and more fundamentally, because plaintiff was not shown to be within the class of alien enemies barred from maintaining an action, either by the rules of the common law, or under the recent statutes of Congress applicable to that subject.

The fundamental rule, as laid down in the books, is that no action can be maintained, either by or in favor of an alien enemy.

Alien—right to maintain action.

Brandon v. Nesbit, 6 T. R. 23, 101 Eng. Reprint, 415, 3 Revised Rep. 109, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 649. But the rule seems to be equally well settled that this defense must be set up by a special plea. The authorities are somewhat confused as to whether the plea at common law was to be classified as a plea in abatement or a plea in bar, but, for present purposes, this is immaterial. 1 Chitty, Pl. pp. 481, 483, 514. The precision required in such a plea is indicated by our early case of Coxe v. Gulick, 10 N. J. L. 328, where the plaintiff was an alien, but not an enemy, and as such was disqualified by the existing law from holding real estate in this state. A leading case is Burnside v. Matthews, 54 N. Y. 78, where the court intimated that if the defense had been properly set up it would have prevailed, but refused to recognize it because it was not pleaded. Similar cases in Massachusetts, with annotations, are Sewall v. Lee, 9 Mass. 363, Martin v. Woods, 9 Mass. 377, and cases in the footnote to page 366. In the English case of Ex parte Boussmaker, 13 Ves. Jr. 71, 33 Eng. Reprint, 221, 9 Revised Rep. 142, Lord Chancellor Erskine remarked that a court of law would not take notice of the objection (of alien enemy) without a plea, and even in chancery it was held that there was no presumption in favor of the plea, and that the facts must be strictly set up. Burk v. Brown, 2 Atk. 397, 26 Eng. Reprint, 640. Under the Practice Act of 1912 and rules germane thereto, it would seem that this defense may be made by a motion substituted for plea in abatement (Rule 56 of 1903) or by answer if considered as a plea in bar at common law. The precise form in which the defense is put upon the record is not so material as that it shall be squarely placed upon the record, and with reasonable precision, corresponding to that required at common law. As already stated, this was not done; and the defense was therefore not maintainable as a matter of practice.

But there is a broader and more fundamental reason for holding that there was error in denying the plaintiff his right to prosecute the action, viz., that he was not shown to be within the class to which the rule is applicable. That rule, as just quoted from the English ruling cases, uses the words "alien enemy," but does not undertake to define or limit the term, although it has been most carefully defined in the cases, both in England and in this country. In the leading case of Wells v. Williams, 1 Ld. Raym. 282, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1086, defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was an alien enemy, and came into England without a safe-conduct, and concluded in bar, to which the plaintiff replied that, at the time of the making of the bond sued on, plaintiff was and still is in England by the license and under the protection of the King. To this the defendant demurred, but the court held that one who comes into the country in time of peace without a safe-conduct and lives here thereafter under the protection of the King, and a war afterwards begins between the two nations, may still maintain an action. The case is also reported in 1 Salk. 46, 91 Eng. Reprint, 45, and Lutw. pt. 1, p. 34, 125 Eng. Reprint, 18.

In 1793, the case of Daubigny v. Davallon was decided by the court of exchequer, and, without going into the precise issues of the case, it is sufficient to quote from the deliverance by Lord Chief Baron Macdonald in 2 Anstr. at page 467, 145 Eng. Reprint, 937: "However the law may originally have stood, it is now settled that alien friends have a right to institute suits in the King's courts for the recovery of their rights; they come into this country, either, as was formerly the case, with a letter of safe-conduct, or under a tacit permission which presumes that authority. So, if they continue to reside here after a war breaks out between the two countries, they remain under the benefit of that protection, and are impliedly temporary subjects of this Kingdom. But if the right of suing for redress of the injuries they received were not allowed them, the protection afforded would be incomplete and merely nominal."

It is worthy of note that Judge Story, in his treatise on Equity Pleading, has frankly incorporated this deliverance into the text of his work. Story, Eq. Pl. § 52.

While, on the one hand, aliens who are subjects of a hostile country, but living and conducting their affairs within the jurisdiction by the sanction and under the protection of the government, are not included within the class of alien enemies to which the rule applies, so, on the other hand, natural-born subjects and citizens living within a hostile country, and conducting their affairs there, are brought within the rule by reason of those facts, and for a fundamental reason of public policy well recognized in the books, viz., that no

benefit to the enemy country, direct or indirect, should be permitted to accrue or result from the maintenance of the action. And so, in a case where parties plaintiff, though natural-born citizens, were resident and doing business in a hostile country, they were not permitted to maintain their claim in the English courts. M'Connell v. Hector, 3 Bos. & P. 113, 127 Eng. Reprint, 61. In that case, Lord Alvanley, Chief Justice, said: "The question is, whether a man who resides under the allegiance and protection of a hostile state for all commercial purposes is not to be considered to all civil purposes as much an alien enemy as if he were born there. If we were to hold that he was not, we must contradict all the modern authorities upon this subject."

The law was fully and, in our view, most satisfactorily laid down by Lord Reading, somewhat obiter, perhaps, but justifiably, in view of the importance of the question, in a group of cases decided together, and which may be cited under the name of Porter v. Freudenberg [1915] 1 K. B. 857, especially at pages 867 and 868, 5 B. R. C. 548, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 215, where he held that the object of the rule is to prevent anything that will be of advantage to the enemy state. "Trading with a British subject," he said, "or the subject of a neutral state carrying on business in the hostile territory, is as much assistance to the alien enemy as if it were with a subject of enemy nationality carrying on business in the enemy state, and therefore, for the purpose of enforcement of civil rights, they are equally treated as alien enemies. It is clear law that the test for this purpose is not nationality, but the place of carrying on the business." He cited the cases of Wells v. Williams and M'Connell v. Hector, supra, and also the more recent case of Jansen v. Driefontein Consol. Mines [1902] A. C. at pages 505, 506, 5 B. R. C. 810, where it is held that "an Englishman carrying on business in an enemy's country is treated as an alien enemy in considering the validity or invalidity of his commercial contracts. . . . Again, the subject of a state at war with this country, but who is carrying on business here, or in a foreign neutral country, is not treated as an alien enemy. The validity of his contracts does not depend on his nationality, nor even on what is his real domicile, but on the place or places in which he carries on his business or businesses."

Lord Reading, in the Porter Case, criticized this passage as somewhat inaccurate, because the court had in mind only a trading corporation as a party, and did not deal with persons residing and not doing business in enemy territory.

The doctrine that place of residence and of conducting business is an essential test in the application of the rule of alien enemy was recognized in this country as early as 1812, and by so eminent an authority as Chancellor Kent, then sitting as chief justice of the state of New York, in the case of Clarke v. Morey, 10 Johns. 69. The plea in that case set up that the plaintiff was an alien enemy, to wit, a subject of Great Britain, with which the United States was at war, and had not been made a citizen of the United States by naturalization or otherwise, but entered and came into the United States and still remains therein without any letters of safe-conduct from the President of the United States, or any license to be, reside, or remain therein. To this the plaintiff demurred, and Chief Justice Kent, after dealing with the technical sufficiency of the plea, said that it would be presumed from the record that plaintiff came to reside here before the war, and therefore no letters of safe-conduct nor license from the President were required; that the license is implied by the law and the usage of nations; if he came here since the war, a license is also implied, and the protection continues until the Executive shall think proper to order the plaintiff out of the United States, but that no such order is stated or averred. He called attention to the fact that the Act of Congress of July 6, 1798, respecting alien enemies, granted permission to the alien to remain, though his sovereign be at war with us. "A lawful residence," he said, "implies protection and a capacity to sue and be sued. A contrary doctrine would be repugnant to sound policy no less than to justice and humanity." Further on, he added: "And it has now become the sense and practice of nations and may be regarded as the public law of Europe (the anomalous and awful case of the present violent power on the continent excepted) that the subjects of the enemy (without confining the rule to merchants), so long as they are permitted to remain in the country, are to be protected in their persons and property, and to be allowed to sue as well as to be sued."

This decision seems to have stood ever since as the law. The recent New York case of Arndt-Ober v. Metropolitan Opera Co. 182 App. Div. 513, 169 N. Y. Supp. 944, is to the same effect. There are several recent cases on the subject in the court of chancery of this state, particularly that of Tortoriello v. Seghorn, — N. J. Eq. —, 103 Atl. 393, where Vice Chancellor Foster points out that subjects of the German Empire, residing in this country and not within the act known as the Trading with the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. 411, chap. 106, Comp. Stat. —, § 3115½a), or the proclamation of the President dated February 5, 1918, are not disqualified as alien enemies from performing a contract into which they had entered. He says most pertinently: "Congress, in the Trading with the Enemy Act, aside from the power thereby vested in the President, has made the test of enemy character depend upon residence, or official or agency relation, and not upon nationality, or mere alienage. The President by his proclamation has extended the ban upon trading only to such aliens as have been or may be arrested and interned in the custody of the War Department for the duration of the war. . . . As a result of this forbearance, aliens not so classified have been at liberty to continue in the pursuit of their business and trade, including the receipt, banking, and expenditure of money belonging to them, without the slightest governmental interference or supervision."

The pertinent sections of the act of Congress are quoted in the opinion just cited, and need not be here repeated. It is sufficient to note that this act was probably passed with due consideration of the equitable and just rule of the common law laid down in both the English and American decisions.

When we come to apply the rule to the case at bar, there is absolutely nothing to show that the plaintiff was either within the class of alien enemy to which the common-law rule applies, or within the inhibitions of the act of Congress or the presidential proclamation. All that appears is that he was of German birth, residing in this country. He was engaged in an apparently peaceful and beneficial occupation in Bayonne, going from and returning to Hoboken every day. The presumption was and is that he is within the class of peaceable citizens of the enemy country, living here under the protection of our laws and attending to their everyday affairs without participation in the hostilities. To say that such a person should not be allowed to sue for the —who is. purpose of collecting his daily wages, or bring an action of damages for assault and battery upon him, or, as in the present case, an action of damages for personal injury sustained by reason of alleged negligence, is to run counter to the rule laid down by so many decisions of which a few have been cited above. Clearly he was entitled to maintain his action and not wait until the ending of the war, at which time the evidence of important witnesses might be lost or other things might happen which would seriously interfere with the proper presentation of the case. Whether, in case plaintiff should secure a verdict and judgment, he should be permitted to collect the judgment, is a matter not before us at this time, and is more properly for the consideration of the official alien property custodian in view of such facts as may be ascertained by him touching the actual relations of plaintiff with the land of his birth and allegiance, not appearing in the printed book before us. Upon that record, the judgment of nonsuit must be reversed, and the case remanded for a venire de novo.

ANNOTATION.

Right of resident alien who is a subject of an enemy country to prosecute suit during war.

As to the effect of war on pending litigation, generally, see annotation appended to Watts, W. & Co. v. Unione Austriaca di Navigazione, ante, 323.

It is a settled rule that a subject of the enemy country residing in the state of the forum, and peacefully carrying on his ordinary vocation, is not under disability in the civil courts, and may therefore institute an action during the continuance of the war, or prosecute one already instituted before the war.

A resident alien enemy who, under the law, has a right to a license to pursue his usual occupation, may maintain a proceeding for a writ of mandamus to compel its issuance. State ex rel. Constanti v. Darwin (1918) 102 Wash. 402, L.R.A.1918F, 1012, 173 Pac. 29.

There is nothing in the terms of the Trading with the Enemy Act of October 6, 1916, to alter the rule that the resident subjects of an enemy nation are entitled to invoke the process of our courts, so long as they are guilty of no act inconsistent with the temporary allegiance which they owe to the government of the United States. Arndt-Ober v. Metropolitan Opera Co. (1918) 102 Misc. 320, 169 N. Y. Supp. 304, affirmed in (1918) 182 App. Div. 513, 169 N. Y. Supp. 944.

The Treaty of 1799, 8 Stat. at L. 174, between the Kingdom of Prussia and the United States, which was reaffirmed by the Treaty of 1828, 8 Stat. at L. 378, in providing that "if war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months, to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance," and in providing that this provision shall not be annulled or suspended by war, would seem to confer upon alien enemies of German nationality, notwithstanding the existence of a state of war, the right to collect their debts by whatever process or remedy the United States or its several states and territories afford, pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Constitution that the treaties of the United States with foreign powers shall be the law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of the several states to the contrary notwithstanding. Fritz Schultz Jr. Co. v. Raimés & Co. (1917) 99 Misc. 626, 164 N. Y. Supp. 454 (dictum).

In order to entitle an alien subject of an enemy country, residing within the local jurisdiction, to sue, it is not necessary for him to allege and prove that he is not a spy and has not committed acts of hostility, but the exception should be invoked by the one who relies upon it. Viola v. Mackenzie, M. & Co. (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 24 B. R. 31, 24 D. L. R. 208.

It has been held that the court cannot, on grounds of public policy, stay an action on the ground that moneys derived from its prosecution will be used in giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Fritz Schultz Jr. Co. v. Raimés & Co. (1917) 99 Misc. 626, 164 N. Y. Supp. 454, affirmed in (1917) 100 Misc. 697, 166 N. Y. Supp. 567; White v. T. Eaton Co. (1916) 36 Ont. L. Rep. 447, 30 D. L. R. 459.

In The Oropa (1919) 255 Fed. 132, it was held that a libel by a seaman to recover his wages would not be dismissed because libellant, who had signed as a seaman in an Italian port on an Italian vessel, and had, prior to the bringing of his suit, declared an intention to become a citizen of the United States, was a citizen and subject of Austria, with which the United States was at war, but that the suit should be continued until the conclusion of peace in order that the libellant might not lose the opportunity, through the departure of the vessel, to try the question of his wages.

It has been held that a resident alien of enemy nationality is not debarred from maintaining an action by the circumstance of his internment as a civilian prisoner of war. Schaffenius v. Goldberg [1916] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 284, 7 B. R. C. 842, 113 L. T. N. S. 949, 32 Times L. R. 133, 60 Sol. Jo. 105, 85 L. J. K. B. N. S. 374, affirming (1915) 32 Times L. R. 31.

But in Lutz v. Van Heynigen Brokerage Co. (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 72, it was held that one who had been interned as a dangerous alien might be considered as having substantially the status of an alien enemy.

In Harasymczuk v. Montreal Light, Heat & P. Co. (1916) Rap. Jud. Quebec 25 B. R. 252, it was held that an alien subject of an enemy country, interned in time of war in Canada because he had no work and would have been a public burden, did not, by reason of such internment, lose his right to prosecute an action for damages occasioned by the death of his son.

The taking of an inventory of the property of the community theretofore existing between the parties will not be suspended on the ground that defendant is an interned enemy. Swaile v. Trieber, 17 Quebec Pr. Rep. 428, as digested in Canadian Ann. Dig. 1916, col. 12.

An alien enemy plaintiff, in an action which has been suspended by judgment on the ground that he was interned as a suspected person, has a right, if he obtains his freedom, to demand a rescission of the orders staying the proceeding. Gusetu v. Laing (1917) 18 Quebec Pr. Rep. 971, as digested in Canadian Ann. Dig. 1917, col. 12.

A prisoner of war taken in an act of hostility may, it seems, sue while in confinement. See Sparenburgh v. Banatyne (1797) 1 Bos. & P. 163, 126 Eng. Reprint, 837, 2 Esp. 581, 4 Revised Rep. 772, in which it was held that a native of a neutral state taken in an act of hostility on board an enemy's fleet is not disabled from suing while in confinement on a contract entered into as a prisoner of war; and in which it was intimated that the same conclusion would have been reached had the plaintiff been an enemy born.

A prisoner of war, however, is not entitled to the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to examine into the propriety of his detention (Three Spanish Sailors' Case (1780) 2 W. Bl. 1324, 96 Eng. Reprint, 775), even though he is the subject of a neutral power and has been forcibly compelled to serve on board the enemy's ship, where he was taken. Rex v. Schiever (1759) 2 Burr. 765, 97 Eng. Reprint, 551.

And the rule that the court will not entertain an application for habeas corpus from a prisoner of war has been held to apply to a civilian subject of an enemy state, who has been interned as a measure of public safety. *Rex v. NORTHWESTERN OIL & GAS COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ELMER L. BRANINE et al.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — October 8, 1918.

(— Okla. —, 175 Pac. 533.)

Mines — oil and gas lease — consideration — surrender clause — mutuality.

1. Where a cash bonus of $160 was paid for an oil and gas lease which provided that lessee should commence the drilling of a well within twelve months from the date thereof or pay a quarterly rental of $40, and further provided that the lessee might at any time upon the payment of a further sum of $2, and as accrued liabilities, surrender the leased premises and terminate all future liabilities under the lease, held, that the cash bonus supports each and all the covenants in the lease; and held, further, that the presence of a surrender clause in said lease did not render the same void for want of mutuality, nor confer on the lessor the right to terminate said lease at will.

Contract — duty of courts to enforce.

2. The court must give effect to the meaning and intention of the parties as expressed in the language of their contract, in the absence of anything to show legal impediment to prevent their entering into any contract they saw fit, or their expressing it in the language of their own choice.

Option — mutuality.

3. The essence of an option contract is that it is not mutual, for the optionee pays his money or performs his promise for the right of electing whether or not he will require performance by the other party, and the optionor relinquishes his right of choice.

— mutual right of nonperformance.

4. The rule that contracts which are optional as to one party are also optional as to the other applies only to contracts that are wholly executory and unperformed, and consist of mutual promises each the consideration of the other.

Landlord and tenant — option in lease — want of mutuality.

5. The fact that an oil and gas lease confers upon the lessee the option of drilling or paying or taking advantage of the surrender clause to terminate the lease does not render the same void for lack of mutuality.

Mines — oil and gas lease — rights under “unless lease.”

6. The lessee in an “unless lease” has an option to continue the lease in force so long as he pays the rentals in the manner provided, and may terminate the same at will by a failure to pay the rental when due; but the lessor has no right to terminate the lease so long as the lessee complies with its terms.

— rights under “or lease.”

7. Payment of rentals by the lessee in an “or lease” according to the terms of the lease, even when containing a surrender clause, is not necessary to keep it alive from time to time, nor does the failure to pay automatically terminate the contract; but while the lessor may waive the forfeiture clause and may sue and recover the rentals due, the lessee may terminate the lease at any time by availing himself of the right to do so contained in the surrender clause, and by paying all the accrued rentals due at the time of surrender.

ERROR to the District Court for Kay County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to cancel and remove as a cloud upon their title, a certain oil and gas lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George S. Ramsey, G. Earl Shaffer, William H. England, Edgar A. de Meules, Malcolm E. Rosser, Villard Martin, and J. Berry King, for plaintiff in error:

The $160 cash bonus is sufficient consideration to support each and every term in the lease, including the right of the lessee to postpone development upon paying $1 per acre per year, however, not longer than five years from the date of the lease.

The conditional surrender clause oil and gas lease for a definite number of years, when supported by a cash bonus, is a valid and binding contract; does not create a tenancy at will nor reserve to the lessor the right to compel the lessee to surrender the lease; a cash bonus supports each and every covenant in the lease, including the right of the lessee to postpone development throughout the entire five-year term, upon paying the lessor the delay money agreed upon.

Hardy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Elmer L. Branine and Mary E. Branine commenced an action on the 18th day of January, 1917, against the Northwestern Oil & Gas Company to cancel and remove as a cloud upon their title a certain oil and gas lease, the pertinent parts of which are as follows:

"Agreement, made and entered into the 3d day of August, A. D.

1915, by and between Elmer L. Branine and Mary E. Branine, his wife, of Hunnewell, Oklahoma, parties of the first part, lessors, and Northwestern Oil & Gas Company, party of the second part, lessee, witnesseth:

"That the said parties of the first part for and in consideration of the sum of $1 to them in hand well and truly paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the covenants and agreements herein-after contained on the part of the party of the second part to be paid, kept, and performed, has granted, demised, leased, and let, and by these presents do grant, demise, lease, and let unto the said second part —, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, power stations, and structures thereon to produce and take care of said products, all that certain tract of land situate in the county of Kay, state of Oklahoma, described as follows, to wit:

"The southeast quarter ( $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of sec. fifteen (15), township (29) north, range (1) west of section 15, township 29, range 1, and containing 160 acres, more or less. It is agreed that this lease shall remain in force for a term of five years from this date and as long thereafter as oil and gas, or either of them, are produced from said land by the party of the second part, their heirs, administrators, executors, successors, or assigns. . . .

"The party of the second part hereby agrees to complete a well on said premises within one year from the date hereof, or to pay at the rate of forty ($40) dollars for each additional three months such completion is delayed from the time above mentioned for the full completion of such well, until a well is completed; and it is agreed that the completion of such well shall be and operate as a full liquidation of all rent under this provision during the remainder of the term of this lease. . . .

"The party of the second part, its successors or assigns, shall have the right at any time, on the payment of $2 to the party of the first part, their heirs or assigns, to surrender this lease for cancelation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine; provided, this surrender clause and the option therein reserved to the lessee shall cease and become absolutely inoperative immediately and concurrently with the institution of any suit in any court of law or equity by the lessee to enforce this lease, or any of its terms, or to recover possession of the leased land, or any part thereof, against or from the lessors, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, or any person or persons. All covenants or agreements herein set forth between the parties hereto shall extend to their successors, heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns."

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that $160 was paid to plaintiffs at the time of the execution of said lease, and that all of the rentals were tendered by the lessee before the date they were payable, in strict conformity with the terms of the lease, but that said tenders were refused by plaintiffs.

It is agreed that the sole question presented is whether the presence of a surrender clause in the lease, whereby the lessee might, on the payment to lessors of the sum of $2, surrender said lease and relieve itself from any further liability thereunder, rendered the lease unilateral and voidable for want of mutuality and conferred a corresponding right on the lessors to terminate said lease at will, and to refuse to accept rentals when tendered, though tendered in strict conformity with the terms of the lease.

Plaintiffs rely on the case of Brown v. Wilson, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94, and concede that, if the decision in that case does not govern here, the judgment of the trial court in plaintiff's favor, canceling the lease, should be reversed and the cause remanded.

At the time the lease was executed, it was not certainly known whether oil and gas, or either of them, would be found upon the premises, and the development thereof would naturally be attended with the hazards incident to the development of unproved territory. Should a failure result, the loss would be borne wholly by the lessee, while, on the contrary, should development prove successful, the lessor, without having run any risk incident to the exploration, would receive a substantial part of the proceeds from the oil and gas produced therefrom. With this situation in the minds of the parties, it was one of the stipulations in the lease that, if a well should not be commenced within twelve months from the date thereof, the lessee should have the right to delay operations by paying to the lessors $40 per quarter. The lease itself is couched in plain and unambiguous language, and there is no claim made of any fraud, deception, or unfair dealing by the lessee in procuring it. There is no legal impediment shown which would prevent the parties from entering into any contract which they saw fit, nor from expressing it in language of their own choice, and under these circumstances it is the duty of the court to give effect to the meaning and intention of the parties as expressed in the language of the contract, and the court has no right to make a contract for the parties different from that actually entered into by them. Rev. Laws 1910, § 949; Cohn v. Clark, 48 Okla. 500, L.R.A.1916B, 686, 150 Pac. 467.

It is contended by plaintiffs that the lease in question does not bind the lessee to drill or pay, and therefore they have the right to terminate same because of the presence of the surrender clause therein. Just here we believe it will be helpful to inquire what is the status of the parties under the contract, and what are their respective rights and liabilities. Plaintiffs claim that the oft-repeated doctrine that "contracts which are unperformed, that are optional as to one party, are also optional as to the other," applies. Is the contract in question one of the character to which this rule is properly applicable? The mere fact that it may constitute an option is not sufficient to bring it within the operation of this rule, for it is of the very essence of an option contract that they are not mutual, for the optionee pays his money or performs his promise

for the right of electing whether he will require performance by the other party, and the optioner relinquishes his right of choice for the consideration received by him. Pittsburg Vitrified Paving & Bldg. Brick Co. v. Bailey, 76 Kan. 42, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, 90 Pac. 803; Poe v. Ulrey, 233 Ill. 57, 84 N. E. 46.

The rule urged only has application to contracts that are wholly executory and unperformed, in that they consist of mutual promises, each the consideration of the other, and where it is optional with one of the parties whether he will perform his promises, in which cases it is also optional with the other. 9 Cyc. 327; 13 C. J. 331, § 179; Lindlay v. Raydure (D. C.) 239 Fed. 928. The lease herein involved was not wholly executory and unperformed. So far as the lessors were concerned, the lease was wholly executed, and by its terms there was granted to the lessee an estate in possession, which vested immediately on its execution and delivery, under which lessees had the right, according to the terms of the lease, for a period of five years to make exploration on the leased premises. Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co. 29 Okla. 719, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 119 Pac. 260;

Brennan v. Hunter, — Okla. —, 172 Pac. 49. Nor was the lease wholly executory as to the lessee. The consideration of $160 had been paid to and accepted by the lessors at the time of its execution, and four successive quarterly payments had been tendered by the lessee in strict conformity with the terms of the lease. There was, therefore, part performance by the lessee.

The fact that the lease conferred upon the lessee the option of drilling or paying or taking advantage of the surrender clause and terminating the lease did not render same void for lack of mutuality. Options in tenant—option in lease—want of mutuality.

leases granting to the lessee the privilege of purchasing the leased premises are valid, and such an option has been recognized in this state. Jones v. Moncrief-Cook Co. 25 Okla. 856, 108 Pac. 403. And no good reason can exist why an option to terminate a lease of the character here involved, when supported by a consideration, should not be upheld. Lindlay v. Raydure, supra. In fact, leases of this character have been before this court in a number of cases, and their validity has been recognized. Burress v. Diem, 23 Okla. 776, 101 Pac. 1116; Cohn v. Clark, 48 Okla. 500, L.R.A. 1916B, 686, 150 Pac. 467; McKee v. Grimm, — Okla. —, 157 Pac. 308.

The decision in Brown v. Wilson held that the $1 paid upon the execution of the lease supported only the first term, or the period in which a well should be commenced, and supported no other condition of the lease. When this construction was placed upon the contract therein involved, it logically followed that the remaining conditions of the lease were without consideration. The decision in that case was also based upon the ground that lessees had made default in the payment of rentals according to the terms of the contract, and that the lessor had the right, under the forfeiture clause, to declare the lease at an end. It is urged that that portion of the opinion holding that the surrender clause rendered the lease unilateral and subject to be terminated at the option of the lessee was in conflict with previous decisions of this court. If it be kept in mind that the $1 paid upon the execution of the lease was held not to support any condition of the lease other than the boring period, there would be no conflict. A number of cases decided by this court have presented for consideration leases wherein was contained a surrender clause, and, prior to Brown v. Wilson, in every instance leases have been upheld.

Before reviewing the opinions upon this point, it is well to observe a general distinction between the different kinds of leases which are in common use in this state. Most of them naturally fall in two classes, commonly designated as the "or lease" and the "unless lease," and leases belonging to these respective classes possess such marked distinctions in the rights and liabilities of the parties thereunder that these distinctions should not be lost sight of. Under what is known as the "unless lease," the lessee, so long as he pays the rentals in the manner provided, has an option to continue the lease in force. Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co. 29 Okla. 719, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 487, 119 Pac. 260; Deming Invest. Co. v. Lanham, 36 Okla. 773, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 50, 130 Pac. 260. Such a lease is subject to termination at the will of the lessee, which privilege may be exercised by a mere failure to pay the stipulated rental at the time due, upon the happening of which the lease automatically terminates, and the lessor cannot maintain an action against the lessee for rentals. But even in an "unless lease" the lessor has not the right to terminate the lease as long as the lessee complies with its terms.

In Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co. supra, the lease provided that if no well was commenced within one year from date the lease should become null and void, unless the lessee should pay $80 for each year thereafter such completion was delayed. It was held that this provision did not bind the lessee to pay any rent for the land or for delay in commencing operation, but that said lease amounted to an option preventing the lessor after receiving the consideration for any period from leasing to another, and that lessee had the option to keep the lease alive by making the payments in accordance with the terms of the lease. In Deming Invest. Co. v. Lanham, supra, the court held that the lessor in an "unless lease" could not recover rentals thereunder, and in this case the court reiterated the doctrine that the lessee had the option, by paying the rentals, to keep the lease alive. The lease in the last-cited case contained a surrender clause. If, under these leases, the lessee had the option, as the court clearly said he had, to keep the lease alive by paying the prescribed rentals, certainly the lessor could not terminate same at will, for the existence of the option by the lessee is inconsistent with and negatives the existence of this right on the part of the lessor.

On the other hand, under the "or lease," even when containing a surrender clause, the payment of rentals by the lessee, according to the terms of the lease, is not necessary to keep it alive from time to time, nor does the failure to pay automatically terminate the contract, as under the "unless lease," and where the lessee makes default in the payment of rentals the lessor may waive —rights under "or lease,"
the forfeiture clause and may sue and recover rentals due according to the terms of the lease. Burress v. Diem, Cohn v. Clark, and McKee v. Grimm, — supra. The lessee, however, may terminate the lease at any time by availing himself of the right to do so contained in the surrender clause and by paying all the accrued rentals due at the time of surrender.

Cohn v. Clark, and Burress v. Diem, supra.

It is a contradiction to say that the lessor in an "or lease" may waive his right to declare a forfeiture for nonpayment of rentals and sue for and recover such rentals until a surrender is made in accordance with the surrender clause, and then say that the presence of this clause renders the lease void for want of mutuality. If the lease was void for this cause, the right upon the part of the lessor to sue for rentals would not exist. In the three cases cited when this court sustained a recovery by the lessor, the validity and binding force of these contracts was recognized, for a recovery could not be upheld upon any other theory, while the court has refused to compel the execution of a lease containing a surrender clause in conformity with an agreement to do so. Superior Oil & Gas Co. v. Mehlin, 25 Okla. 809, 138 Am. St. Rep. 942, 108 Pac. 545; Hill Oil & Gas Co. v. White, 53 Okla. 748, 157 Pac. 710. And has also refused specific performance of such a lease, when executed, for the reason that the surrender clause therein contained gave to the lessee the option to terminate same at any time. Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902. And has also held that such contracts will be strictly construed against the lessee. Ibid.; Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co. 29 Okla. 719, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 119 Pac. 260. These holdings are far from saying that such contracts are void when based upon a consideration. In the Hill Oil & Gas Co. Case, the rule was correctly stated that "contracts unperformed [without sufficient consideration], which are optional as to one, . . . are optional as to both." This statement implies a clear recognition of the validity of an optional contract when based upon a sufficient consideration. In none of the previous decisions of this court, involving either an "or" lease or an "unless" lease, is there any support found for the contention that the presence of a surrender clause in a lease based upon a sufficient consideration, which has been executed voluntarily by parties capable of contracting, and which is free from any of the elements that render a contract void or voidable, confers upon the lessor a corresponding right to forfeit the lease at his option, without any agreement to that effect, and without the payment or promise of payment of any consideration therefor.

Development was not the sole consideration for the lease. The bonus of $160 supported each and every term, including the right to postpone development upon paying a stipulated rental in conformity with the covenants of the lease, and the option to surrender upon paying the stipulated sum of

$5. The lease was for five years, and as long thereafter as oil and gas were found in paying quantities, the lessor agreeing to commence a well within twelve months, or in lieu thereof to pay the stipulated rentals. Of course, if no cash bonus had been paid, development would be the sole consideration. Such is the holding of the courts where there was no cash bonus, or where the consideration was nominal and was disregarded. Also, if there had been no agreement to delay drilling beyond a period of one year, then the court might say that unless the premises were developed within that period the lease might be terminated. But here the parties have expressly agreed for a good and sufficient consideration that the lessee may postpone development upon the payment of a certain sum of money. This condition was doubtless suggested by the undeveloped condition of the district in which the leased premises are situated, and by the risks incident to exploring for oil and gas. This covenant was satisfactory to the lessor at the time, and we know of no reason why the deliberate agreement of the parties, expressed in language of their own choice, which is unambiguous, should not be given that effect and meaning which it was intended should be given thereto. The court has no right to fractionize the contract or divide it up into sections, and say that the cash bonus supports any particular covenant to the exclusion of another, when such construction would be contrary to the clear intention of the parties, as gathered from the face of their written agreement. The conclusion that the cash bonus paid upon the execution and delivery of the lease supports each and all of the terms and conditions contained therein, including the surrender clause, is sustained by all the courts, except in those cases where a nominal consideration was rendered and was held insufficient. *Allegheny Oil Co. v. It would be manifestly inequitable to permit the lessor who has entered into a contract that is free from fraud and received a substantial consideration therefor, to retain that consideration, avoid the lease, and deprive the lessee of the privilege or option which it has purchased and paid for. I am therefore of the opinion that the presence of the surrender clause in the lease involved did not render it void for want of mutuality and did not confer on the lessor the right to terminate the lease at will, and that the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is, hereby reversed, and this cause remanded.

(— Okla. —, 177 Pac. 86.)

Mines — oil and gas lease — option to surrender — consideration — mutuality.

1. The owners of a tract of 60 acres of land executed an instrument, denominated an oil and gas lease, by the terms of which they granted, demised, leased, and let the same to another, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, power stations, and structures thereon, to procure and take care of said products. The grant was for a term of five years from date and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, was produced by said party. The instrument recited a consideration of $1 paid by the lessee to the lessors. The lessee agreed to deliver to lessors one eighth of the oil produced and saved from the premises; to pay a certain stipulated sum per annum for each gas well, and for gas utilized from each oil well. The lessee further agreed to complete a well on said premises within six months, or pay at the rate of $15 for each additional month such completion was delayed. The instrument contained the further provision that the lessee should have the right at any time, on payment of $1 to the lessors, to surrender the lease for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms should cease and determine. In an action by the owners of the land to cancel the instrument and remove same as a cloud on their title, commenced prior to the expiration of the term of five years, it appearing that no well had been commenced, but that the lessee had made timely payments or tender of all sums stipulated to be paid for delay in completing a well, held, (a) that the consideration recited in the face of the instrument is sufficient to support the grant of the exclusive right to occupy the land and explore the same for oil and gas and to take and remove such as may be found therein for the entire term specified, and also the right of the lessee, on compliance with the conditions expressed, to terminate the same; (b) that the agreement is not void for the want of mutuality; (c) that, although no well had been commenced on the premises, the lessors had not the option to refuse timely tender of payments for delay in completing a well and terminate the grant, or to compel a surrender thereof; (d) that the instrument does not create a tenancy at will within the operation of the rule that an estate at the will of one party is equally at the will of the other.

ERROR to the District Court for Pontotoc County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to cancel and remove an oil and gas lease as a cloud on their title to a certain tract of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. West, Sherman, & Davidson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Prichard & Allen, for defendants in error:

The lessee was given the right, by virtue of the surrender clause, to pay for delay in development, or surrender the lease for cancellation, and thereby terminate the contract.

Brown v. Wilson, — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94; Eastern Oil Co. v. Beatty, — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 104.

Miley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the 3 A.L.R.—23.

court below on the 9th day of September, 1915, by defendants in error as plaintiffs therein, to cancel and remove, as a cloud upon their title to a certain tract of 60 acres of land, an oil and gas lease which they had executed thereon and delivered to the plaintiff in error, defendant below, on the 29th day of December, 1914. There was judgment for the plaintiffs, to reverse which this proceeding in error was prosecuted. The pertinent provisions of the lease are as follows:

"Agreement made and entered into the 29th day of December, 1914, by and between M. P. Donaghey and Sallie Donaghey, of Ada, Oklahoma, party of the first part, lessors, and Fred S. Rich, of Oil City, Pennsylvania, party of the second part, lessees.

"Witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of \$1 to them in hand well and truly paid by the said party of the second part, and receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained on the part of the party of the second part to be paid, kept, and performed, have granted, demised, leased, and let, and by these presents do grant, demise, lease, and let, unto the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, powers, stations, and structures thereon, to procure and take care of said products, all that certain tract of land situated in the county of Pontotoc, state of Oklahoma, described as follows, to wit: The south half ( $\frac{1}{2}$ ) of the northwest quarter (N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of the northwest quarter (N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ), and the southwest quarter (S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of the northwest quarter (N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of section 28, township 4 north, range 6 east of the Indian base and meridian, and containing sixty (60) acres, more or less.

"It is agreed that this lease shall remain in force for a term of five years from this date, and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced from said land by the party of the second part, his heirs, administrators, executors, successors, or assigns.

"In consideration of the premises, the said party of the second part covenants and agrees:

"First. To deliver to the credit of the first parties, their heirs or assigns, free of cost, in the pipe line to which the wells may be connected, the equal one-eighth part of all oil produced and saved from the leased premises.

"Second. To pay the first party two hundred and  $\frac{no}{100}$  dollars each year in advance for the gas from each well where gas only is found, while the same is being used off the premises, and the first parties to have gas free of cost from any such well for four stoves and twelve inside lights in the principal dwelling house on said land during the same time, at their own risk, by making their own connections with the well.

"Third. To pay the first party for gas produced from any oil well and used off the premises at the rate of $50 per year for the time during which such gas shall be used, said payments to be made each three months in advance.

"The party of the second part agrees to complete a well on said premises within six months from the date hereof, or pay at the rate of fifteen and  $\frac{no}{100}$  dollars for each additional month such completion is delayed from the time above mentioned for the completion of such well until a well is completed; and it is agreed that the completion of such well shall be and operate as a full liquidation of all rent under this provision during the remainder of the term of the lease. . . .

"All payments which may fall due under this lease may be made directly to M. P. Donaghey, of Ada, Oklahoma, or deposited to his credit in Oklahoma State Bank, of Ada, Oklahoma.

"The party of the second part, its successors or assigns, shall have the right at any time, on the payment of $1 to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, to surrender this lease for cancelation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine; provided, this surrender clause, and the option therein reserved to the lessee, shall cease and become absolutely inoperative immediately and concurrently with the institution of any suit in any court of law or equity by the lessee to enforce this lease, or any of its terms, or to recover possession of the leased land or any part thereof, against or from the lessor, his heirs, executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, or any other person or persons. All covenants and agreements herein set forth between the parties hereto shall extend to their successors, heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns."

In his brief the plaintiff in error states the issues made by the pleadings as follows:

"The petition of the plaintiffs, after setting forth the execution and delivery of the lease, alleges:

"That said defendant has wholly failed, neglected, and refused to comply with any of the terms, covenants, agreements, and conditions of said lease contract in this, that said defendant has made no start or effort to commence a well on said premises, nor has done or performed any act showing any intention on his part to commence said well; neither has said defendant made payment for the delay in completion of such well, as provided in said contract. That the defendant has never entered upon, nor taken possession of, said premises, but has wholly abandoned the same, and made default of his right, title, or interest to and in said premises.

"That said lease contract provides that the party of the second part, the defendant herein, shall have the right at any time, on the payment of $1 to the parties of the first part, the plaintiffs herein, to surrender this lease for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine; that heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of September, 1915, the plaintiffs herein sent by registered letter the $1 provided by said lease to the defendant, with the written request that the said defendant should release of record said contract; that on the 8th day of September, 1915, the said defendant refused to release of record said contract.

"Plaintiffs further allege that wells have been sunk on lands adjacent to plaintiff's said land, and oil or gas produced in said wells, and gas is being extracted from under the adjacent land, and that it is necessary for plaintiffs to have their said land mined and operated to conserve the oil and gas contained in and under their said land; . . . that plaintiffs will suffer great and irreparable damage and loss by reason of oil and gas being extracted from their said lands through wells now in operation on adjacent land."

"It is alleged that the lease ought to be canceled as a cloud upon title of plaintiffs, and the prayer is that they have judgment against the defendant, canceling said lease upon the grounds stated.

"The defendant answered, denying the allegation of nonpayment of rentals, and alleging affirmatively that he had in fact paid, or tendered, the rentals as provided in the lease, and that he had performed, and was performing, all the conditions and requirements of his lease.

"The answer denied that oil or gas was being extracted from adjoining lands; and further set forth that the defendant intended, in good faith and with due and proper diligence, to operate the land for oil and gas, and to protect the same from being drained by exploration or development on the surrounding land, and denied the right of the plaintiffs to the relief prayed for on the grounds stated in their petition."

This statement of the issues is not controverted by defendants in error. The cause came on to be heard by the court upon the issues thus joined. The court made findings of fact to the effect that the lessors, as owners of the land, executed and delivered the lease as above stated; that no well had been drilled or completed on the premises within six months from the date of the lease, but that the first two months' payments accruing, after the expiration of said six months' period, were duly made by lessee and accepted by the lessors; that the payment for the third month was duly tendered by the lessee to the lessors, which they refused to accept, but tendered the lessee the sum of $1 and form of release of said oil and gas lease, and demanded that the lessee execute the same; that the lessee refused to accept the said sum and to execute said release, and deposited the said sum of $15 for the third month's delay to the credit of the lessors in the bank designated as the depository thereof; that the lessee had deposited all sums accruing under the terms of said lease for delay in completion of a well to the date of the trial in said bank to the credit of the lessors, but which sums had not been withdrawn by them.

The trial court concluded upon the facts so found that, "because of the surrender clause in said lease, the said lease was unilateral and void, and that the lessors, under the terms of said surrender clause, had the right, notwithstanding the payment and tender of rentals, to surrender the same at any time, upon the payment to the lessee of $1, and that, having exercised said right, they were entitled to have said lease canceled as a cloud on their title to the lands covered by said lease," and judgment was rendered accordingly. There was no finding that the lessee had abandoned the premises, as alleged in the petition; neither was there a finding that the lessee was guilty of negligence in permitting the land to be drained of oil or gas by operations on adjoining premises. There was no finding of fact upon which to base a decree of forfeiture or cancelation of the lease for failure to make payments for delay, or the failure to perform any condition or covenant therein.

The parties agree that the only question to be decided by this court is whether the trial court erred in the conclusions just quoted, decreeing a cancelation of the lease upon the facts found.

In the consideration of the questions presented it will perhaps prove helpful if notice be first taken of the rights of the lessee created by the written instrument in question. At the time of its execution the plaintiffs were the owners in fee simple of the land. By virtue of such ownership they had, on account of the "vagrant and fugitive nature" of the substances, constituting "a sort of subterranean feræ naturæ" (Re Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. 43 Okla. 307, 142 Pac. 997), no absolute right or title to the oil or gas <sup>Minerals—title to oil and gas.</sup> which might permeate the strata underlying the surface of their land, as in the case of coal or other solid minerals fixed in, and forming a part of, the soil itself. Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576.

But with respect to such oil and gas, they had certain rights designated by the same courts as a qualified ownership thereof, but which may be more accurately stated as <sup>—right to operate for oil.</sup> exclusive right, subject to legislative control against waste and the like, to erect structures on the surface of their land, and explore therefor by drilling wells through the underlying strata, and to take therefrom and reduce to possession, and thus acquire absolute title as personal property to such as might be found and obtained thereby. This right is the proper subject of sale, and <sup>—grant of right.</sup> may be granted or reserved. Barker v. Campbell-Ratcliff Land Co. — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1918A, 487, 167 Pac. 468. The right so granted or reserved, and held separate and apart from the possession of the land itself, is an incorporeal hereditament; or more specifically, as designated in the ancient French, a profit à prendre, analogous to a profit to hunt and fish on the land of another. Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 203; Phillips v. Springfield Crude Oil Co. 76 Kan. 783, 92 Pac. 1119. Considered with respect to duration, if the grant be to one and his heirs and assigns forever, it is of an interest in fee. Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 203. An interest of less duration may be granted, and that for a term of years has been denominated by this court a chattel real. Duff v. Keaton, 33 Okla. 92, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 472, 124 Pac. 291. Such right is an interest in land. 14 Cyc. 1144; Heller v. Dailey, 28 Ind. App. 555, 63 N. E. 490. If granted in the homestead of the family, the wife must join in the conveyance. Carter Oil Co. v. Popp, — Okla. —, 174 Pac. 747. A grant thereof is an alienation within the meaning of the acts of Congress removing restrictions (Eldred v. Okmulgee Loan & T. Co. 22 Okla. 742, 98 Pac. 929), or imposing restrictions (Parker v. Riley, 155 C. C. A. 572, 243 Fed. 42), on the alienation of allotted Indian land, and is a conveyance within the meaning of § 9, Act Cong. May 27, 1908, chap. 199 (35 Stat. at L. 315, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 890), providing that "no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir" in land inherited from any deceased allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall be valid unless approved by the county court. Hoyt v. Fixico, — Okla. —, 175 Pac. 517.

Bearing these principles in mind, it will at once be seen that by this instrument the plaintiffs granted to the defendant a present vested interest in their land.

Brennan v. Hunter, — Okla. —, 172 Pac. 49; Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine, — Okla. —, ante, 344, 175 Pac. 533. That is, the right for at least five years, of mining and operating thereon for oil and gas, which includes, of course, the right to explore therefor, and to extract therefrom and reduce to possession, as their personal property, such as may be found. In other words, it was a grant of the exclusive right, for the time specified, to take all the oil and gas that could be found by drilling wells upon the particular tract of land, with the accompanying incidental right to occupy so much of the surface as required to do those things necessary to the discovery of and for the enjoyment of the principal right so to take oil or gas. No more nor greater right, except perhaps as to duration, with respect to oil and gas, could be granted. Although there had been in terms a purported conveyance of all the oil and gas in the place, yet, by reason of the nature of these substances, no title thereto or estate therein would have vested, but only the right to search for and reduce to possession such as might be found; and when reduced to possession, not merely discovered, title thereto and an estate therein as corporeal property would vest. Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902; Frank Oil Co. v. Bellevue Gas & Oil Co. 29 Okla. 719, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 119 Pac. 260; Hill Oil & Gas Co. v. White, 53 Okla. 748, 157 Pac. 710. Though denominated a lease, and in deference to custom will be so referred to herein, the instrument before us, strictly speaking, is not such, but is in effect a grant in praesenti of all the right to the oil and gas to be found in the lands described, with the right for a term of five years to enter and search therefor, and, if found, to produce and remove them, not only during said term, but also as long thereafter as either is produced, and to occupy so much of the surface of the land as may be necessary for the purpose of exploration or production, or both.

The trial court held that the contract granting this present vested interest in the land was "unilateral and void." Strictly speaking, a unilateral contract is one in which there is a promise on one side only, the consideration on the other side being executed. Evidently the term was not used in that sense by the trial court, for such contracts are not void, but are equally as valid as bilateral contracts, consisting solely of mutual promises to do some future act, in which the consideration of the promise of one party is a promise on the part of the other. The term, "unilateral," is often used to express absence of mutuality. In the case of contracts made up solely of mutual promises, each the consideration for the other, where the promises of one party are so expressed as not to be absolutely binding on him, but to be performed only if such party so wills, or a promise on but one side and no consideration therefor, the one who makes the absolute promise in the one case, or the sole promise in the other, is not bound to perform. The reason sometimes given is that the contract is unilateral, or void for the want of mutuality. The real reason is that there is not a sufficient consideration for the promise. "Consideration is essential; mutuality of obligation is not, unless the want of mutuality would leave one party without a valid or available consideration for his promise." 6 R. C. L. p. 686. Therefore, what the trial court no doubt meant was that the lessee neither gave nor made a binding promise of anything of value for the grant of the right to explore the land and produce the oil or gas, if any found thereon. In other words, that there was not a sufficient consideration for the grant. In this the court erred.

It is provided by statute in this state that a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration. Rev. Laws 1910, § 934. Also that the burden of showing a want of consideration lies with the party seeking to invalidate it. Id. § 935. Any benefit conferred, or agreed to be conferred, upon the lessors by the lessee, to which the lessors were not lawfully entitled, or any prejudice (detriment) suffered, or agreed to be suffered, by the lessee, other than such as he was at the time of the execution of the instrument bound to suffer, is a good consideration. Id. § 926.

Among the considerations expressed in this instrument are the covenants and agreements of the lessee to pay certain stipulated royalties for oil, and for each gas well, and to complete a well within six months, or pay at the rate of $15 for each additional month such completion is delayed. It will be conceded that this agreement to develop, and the prospective royalties, or the monthly payments in lieu of development, standing alone, would constitute a sufficient consideration. But it is contended that under the clause in the instrument conferring on the defendant the option to surrender the lease for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine, the lessee was not bound to perform these promises, or, as it is said, not bound to do anything. This statement would appear to be too sweeping. Instead of not being bound to do anything, the lessee is obligated thereunder to do one of three things: (1) Drill and complete a well in a fixed time, or (2) surrender all his rights and pay in addition the sum of $1, or (3) pay during the term of five years, or until surrender, $15 per month for each additional month the completion of a well is delayed. The lessee cannot escape from all these obligations. He may escape two of them, but he is absolutely bound to do one of the three. If he does the first, and fails to find oil or gas, he will suffer a detriment, and, if oil or gas is discovered, will confer a benefit on the lessor by way of royalties on the oil and gas produced. If he does the second, he will suffer a detriment and confer a corresponding benefit on the lessor. If he does neither of these, he is absolutely obligated to the other, and the amounts agreed to be paid for the delay may be recovered in an action therefor. Cohn v. Clark, 48 Okla. 500, L.R.A.1916B, 686, 150 Pac. 467; McKee v. Grimm, — Okla. —, 157 Pac. 308. If the lessee should choose to perform what may seem to be the least onerous obligation, and surrender, the lessor will obtain some benefit and the lessee suffer some detriment, at least to the extent of $1. It would seem, therefore, that under these alternative obligations to develop, or surrender, or pay for delay, a consideration is not wanting. The fact that the lessee must pay $1 at the time he exercises the right of surrender should, it would seem, afford ground for distinguishing decisions holding that the lessee was not obligated to anything, where, under the leases there under consideration, the lessee was not obligated to pay anything at the time of the surrender, or in which it was provided that the lease should terminate and become void as to both parties unless a stipulated sum was paid for delay. But, putting that aside, if we give the surrender clause the sweeping effect claimed, and assume that by virtue thereof the lessee has given no binding promise to drill or pay, or do anything, and treat the instrument as though it recited no promise whatever, or imposed no obligations to pay royalties, and to develop, or pay a fixed sum at stated times in lieu thereof, it does not follow that the instrument is without sufficient consideration. Grants of this character are not dependent for their validity on an agreement to pay royalties and the consequent expressed or implied covenant to develop. They may be for any other consideration agreeable to the parties and valuable in law. The consideration may be wholly executed. Section 930, Rev. Laws 1910. It may be in money only, paid at the time of the execution and delivery of the instrument. Such moneyed consideration, in addition to the covenants before referred to, is recited to have been paid and its receipt acknowledged in the face of the instrument. It is true that the amount recited is small, being only $1, but a dollar is the unit of value, and is a thing of value in fact and in the eye of the law; many sales and transactions are had daily in which that sum is the sole consideration. That $1 is a sufficient consideration to support a conveyance of land or an agreement is supported by the overwhelming weight of authority. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 2 How. 426, 11 L. ed. 326; Davis v. Wells, F. & Co. 104 U. S. 159, 26 L. ed. 686; Olds v. Marshall, 93 Ala. 138, 8 So. 284; Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Harris, 117 Ga. 1001, 44 S. E. 885; Mason v. Moulden, 58 Ind. 1; St. Clair v. Marquell, 161 Ind. 56, 67 N. E. 693; Fairley v. Fairley, 34 Miss. 18; Weissenfels v. Cable, 208 Mo. 515, 106 S. W. 1028; Stamper v. Venable, 117 Tenn. 557, 97 S. W. 812; Jacobson v. Nealand, 122 Iowa, 372, 98 N. W. 158; Nave v. Marshall, 9 Ohio Dec. 415; Ferguson's Appeal, 117 Pa. 426, 11 Atl. 885; Watkins v. Robertson, 105 Va. 269, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1194, 115 Am. St. Rep. 880, 54 S. E. 33; Tonera v. Henderson, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 235.

The validity of a conveyance of land upon a consideration of $1 has been recognized by this court. Ehrig v. Adams, — Okla. —, 169 Pac. 645; Henley v. Davis, — Okla. —, 156 Pac. 337. If $1 is sufficient to support a conveyance of the whole estate in land, it necessarily follows that it is sufficient to support a grant of a less interest therein. So, if the sole consideration paid for the grant had been the $1 paid as recited in the instrument, it would not follow that the same is void. While such consideration may appear to be insignificant, and as the sole consideration for the grant may, according to circumstances, be inadequate, yet we are not here concerned with the question of the amount or adequacy of the consideration, but only with the question of whether there is any consideration. The $1 is not the sole consideration, however. It may be urged that it is not the real consideration, but that development and prospective royalties, as has been said in some decisions, were the real or moving consideration. That statement would hardly be accurate here, since the parties agreed that development might be deferred throughout the five-year term, and provided stipulated monthly payments in lieu thereof. It would be more accurate to say that one of the considerations, perhaps the principal one, for the grant was the covenant to develop and yield prospective royalties, or pay in lieu thereof. In this connection, it is argued that, by virtue of the surrender clause, the lessee has the option of terminating the lease, and thereby to escape the obligation to develop or pay in lieu thereof, and thus defeat the main purpose or object of the lessor in making the grant, and therefore that it is likewise optional with the lessor to refuse payments for delay and to compel a surrender. To support this argument, the somewhat misleading, though euphonious, epigram, "that contracts unperformed, optional as to one of the parties, are optional as to both," is invoked. That rule can have no application here. It applies to contracts consisting entirely of mutual promises wholly executory and unperformed, the promises on one side being the sole consideration for the promises on the other, and in which, if it is optional with one of the parties whether he will perform his promises, it is said that, prior to performance of such promises by him, it is optional with the other whether he will perform his promises. It is but another way of stating the rule of mutuality before referred to. The epigram, as amended by Mr. Justice Hardy, in Hill Oil & Gas Co. v. White, 53 Okla. 748, 157 Pac. 710, is a more accurate statement of the true rule. It was there said that "contracts unperformed, without sufficient consideration, which are optional as to one, are optional as to both." As pointed out in Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine, — Okla. —, ante, 344, 175 Pac. 533, the contract here under consideration was not wholly executory and unperformed. So far as the lessors are concerned, the lease was fully executed, and by its terms there was granted to the lessee an interest in the land to explore the same for oil and gas, and to produce such as might be found, which interest vested immediately upon execution and delivery of the instrument. Nor was the lease wholly unperformed on the part of the lessee with respect to the covenant now under consideration. He had made two of the monthly payments for delay, which had been accepted, and had tendered the payment for the third month before demand was made for cancelation, and has since performed the promise to pay for delay by depositing the amounts due in the designated bank, in strict conformity with the terms of the agreement. However, if it be assumed that the agreement, being fully executed on one side and partly performed on the other, does not make the rule inapplicable, yet the fact that the agreement is founded on an independent consideration, namely, the $1 paid by the lessee at the execution and delivery of the instrument, does have that effect.

sufficiency.

In 13 C. J. 336, it is said: "When there is an agreement founded on a consideration, it is not invalid for the want of mutuality because one party has an option while the other has not, or, in other words, because it is obligatory on one and optional with the other. . . . And the option to relinquish a right acquired under a contract will not render it unilateral."

In 6 R. C. L. p. 687, it is said: "An option, supported by a consideration, furnishes another illustration of a contract which is valid notwithstanding the lack of mutuality. It is no objection to the validity of the contract that the holder of the option is under no obligation to exercise it."

These principles have been recognized and applied by this court. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Progressive Gin Co. — Okla. —, 159 Pac. 349.

In the case of Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine, supra, this court recently held valid a lease in all respects similar to the one now before us, where a consideration of $160 was paid, and containing covenants for the payment of royalties, for drilling a well within a fixed time, or periodical payments for delay, and providing that the lessee might surrender the same upon payment of $2, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms should cease and determine. In that case we expressly held that, when supported by a sufficient independent consideration, leases of the character here involved are not void for the want of mutuality. The only difference between that case and this is that in this the amount of the consideration is smaller. The cases cannot be distinguished in principle on that ground. The following authorities hold that $1 is a sufficient consideration to bind the lessor in a surrender clause lease such as we have here under consideration: Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 116, 59 L. ed. 856, 865, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526; Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co. 72 C. C. A. 213, 140 Fed. 801; Allegheny Oil Co. v. Snyder, 45 C. C. A. 604, 106 Fed. 764; *Lindley v. Cas. 1912B, 360; South Penn Oil Co. v. Snodgrass, 71 W. Va. 438, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 848, 76 S. E. 961; Pyle v. Henderson, 65 W. Va. 39, 63 S. E.

762; Gillespie v. Fulton Oil & Gas Co. 236 Ill. 188, 86 N. E. 219.

In Murray v. Barnhart, 117 La. 1023, 42 So. 489, the supreme court of Louisiana held a lease invalid which was supported by a consideration of $1. By the provisions of the Code which obtains in that state the consideration for a contract of sale "must be serious;" "it must not be out of proportion with the value of the thing," which is a principle of the civil law. In the decision of that case the court was careful to distinguish decisions by courts in states where the common law prevails. The court correctly stated that in common-law jurisdictions the rule is "that the slightest consideration is sufficient to support the most onerous obligation. The inadequacy, as has been said, is for the parties to consider at the time of making the agreement, and not for the court when it is sought to be enforced," while in their jurisdiction the rule is as above stated. That decision has been followed in that jurisdiction in Jennings-Heywood Oil Syndicate v. Houssiere-Latreille Oil Co. 119 La. 793, 44 So. 501; Long v. Sun Co. 132 La. 601, 61 So. 684, and other cases. For the reasons stated those cases are not authorities in this jurisdiction, where the common-law rule as to consideration governs.

That court does not hold that when a lease providing stipulated royalties to be paid lessors is supported by a consideration sufficient under their law to support a contract—that is, a "serious" consideration, and not out of proportion with the value of the thing—that the same is void for want of mutuality, in that the lessee is not obligated to drill or pay a stipulated sum in lieu thereof. Saunders v. Busch-Everett Co. 138 La. 1049, 71 So. 153, was an action by the lessor against the lessee to annul leases on two different tracts of land, containing, respectively, 1,745 acres and 100 acres, on the ground that same were void for want of mutuality. The leases were for a consideration of $261.75 and $14.97, respectively, or about 15 cents per acre, and reserved to the lessor one eighth of the oil produced and saved, and lessee agreed to pay $200 per annum for each gas well. There was a condition in each to the effect that, in case a well was not commenced in one year, then the grant should immediately become null and void as to both parties, and provided that the lessee might prevent such forfeiture from quarter to quarter for five years by paying the lessor the sums of $261.75 and $14.97, respectively, per year until such well was commenced. The leases further provided that, if oil or gas was discovered, then the same should remain in force and effect for twenty-five years from that date, and as much longer as oil or gas might be produced in paying quantities. The court, in sustaining the leases, held the purpose thereof was to confer the right to drill without imposing an obligation to do so, and after reviewing the provisions of their Code and the previous decisions of the court, some of which are cited above, held that there was nothing in the purpose or nature of the contract which contravened any law of that state; and further held that, if the transaction be considered a sale, it could not be said, under the circumstances in evidence, that the price (being the payments made at the execution of the lease and subsequently for delay) was not "serious," or "was out of all proportion to the value of the thing."

In Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. (C. C.) 112 Fed. 373, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 25, in the United States circuit court, specific performance at the suit of the lessee was refused, of a lease reciting a consideration of $1. The lease covered 80 acres of land, provided for the payment to the lessor of a royalty of one eighth of the oil, and $100 per year for each gas well; and further provided that, in case no well was commenced within one day, the lease should become null and void unless the lessee should thereafter pay in advance at the rate of $8.75 for each month such commencement was delayed; and also that a second well should be completed ninety days after first well, and a well each ninety days thereafter until seven were in, then rental to cease. The lessee was given the right to cancel and annul the contract or any part thereof at any time. The lease specified no terms, and provided no limitation of time beyond which commencement of operations could be postponed by the monthly payments. The decision was on a demurrer to the verified bill, in which it was alleged that the interest acquired by the lessee exceeded in value the sum of $2,000. Speaking of the consideration of $1, the district judge said: "If there was no further consideration which the lessee was bound to yield to the lessors, a court of equity would be bound to refuse the enforcement of the lease. The consideration would be so trifling, compared with the value of the leasehold interest, as to shock the moral sense. An agreement may be enforceable at law, and there may be no sufficient ground for its cancelation in equity; and yet, upon a fair and just consideration of the attendant and collateral circumstances, the court may be satisfied that the contract is unconscionable, and refuse to decree its performance. Before granting a decree the court must be satisfied not only of the existence of a valid contract free from fraud and enforceable at law, but also of its fairness and of its harmony with equity and good conscience; and any fact showing that the contract is unfair, unjust, and against good conscience will justify the court in refusing to decree its performance."

The terms of the lease with reference to development and payments for delay are reviewed in the decision, and it was held on the whole to be so unfair, unjust, and against good conscience as to justify the court in refusing a decree of specific performance, "though the contract might be enforceable at law, and there was no sufficient ground for its cancelation in equity." The decision was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals in Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. 57 C. C. A. 428, 121 Fed. 674, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 429, upon the ground stated; and also for the further reason that, to afford the relief, "the contract must be such that the court is able to make an efficient decree for its specific performance, and to enforce the decree when made," and "equity will not specifically enforce a contract against one party when it cannot be specifically enforced against the other." Under the terms of the lease in that case, the lessee could not be compelled to either drill or pay, even after obtaining a decree and possession thereunder, nor did the lessee in his bill offer performance. Specific performance was refused for that reason by this court in Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902. But these decisions have no application to this case. In the first place, this is not a suit by the lessee for specific performance, but a suit by the lessors for cancelation. The decisions in that case, instead of holding that an oil and gas lease for a consideration of $1 and an agreement to drill, or pay for delay, coupled with an option to the lessee to surrender, are invalid and unenforceable at law, or subject to cancelation in equity, by implication hold to the contrary. In addition, there is no allegation or finding here as to the value of the interest acquired by the lessee; therefore it cannot be said in this case that the $1 consideration is "so trifling, compared with the value of the leasehold interest, as to shock the moral sense," nor is there any allegation or finding here from which the real value can be determined. It may be that the $1 is all or even more than the oil and gas interest is worth.

Furthermore, if this was a suit by the lessee for specific performance, instead of by the lessors for cancelation, or if it should be assumed that the principles upon which Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. was decided are applicable to a suit for cancelation, the decision would have no application to the facts of this case. In Smith v. Guffey, 120 C. C. A. 436, 202 Fed. 106, the circuit court of appeals, upon the authority of the Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. supra, denied the lessee equitable relief to enforce or protect his rights under a lease different from the one involved in the case followed, but similar to the one here under consideration. The lease involved in Smith v. Guffey was for a recited consideration of $1, for a term of five years, and as long thereafter as either oil or gas was produced. The lessee covenanted to pay certain stipulated royalties, and to complete a well within nine months, or pay at the rate of 25 cents per acre quarterly in advance for each additional three months such completion was delayed. The lease contained a surrender clause providing that the lessee, "upon the payment of one dollar ($1) at any time, . . . shall have the right to surrender this lease for cancelation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine and this lease become absolutely null and void." But the Supreme Court of the United States, on appeal, reversed the decision of the circuit court of appeals (Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 59 L. ed. 856, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526). Referring to the contention that the lease was so unfair and inequitable in its terms that relief in equity should be denied the lessee, the court in a unanimous opinion, after detailing the circumstances in which it was given, said: "The consideration for the lease, viz., $1, paid to the lessor, and the covenants and agreements of the lessee, cannot be pronounced unreasonable. Similar leases, resting upon a like consideration, often have been sustained in cases not distinguishable from this. The lease was to remain in force five years, and as much longer as oil or gas was being produced from the premises; in other words, it was to expire in five years unless oil or gas was produced within that time. The lessee expressly covenanted to drill a well within nine months or to pay a rental of 25 cents per acre per year, quarterly in advance, for such time as the completion of the well was delayed beyond that period, the delay, of course, not to extend beyond the primary term of five years. The terms of the covenant doubtless were suggested by the undeveloped condition of the district, and by the expense and risk incident to exploring for oil and gas. They evidently were satisfactory to the lessor at the time, and the record discloses no reason for holding that in the circumstances they were unreasonably liberal to the lessee. Some criticism is directed against the reserved option to surrender, but it is difficult to perceive how it could be declared inequitable. If it was not exercised the lessee would be bound by his covenants, and if exercised the lessor would be free to deal with the premises as he chose. A surrender was not to affect any existing liability, but only to avoid those 'thereafter to accrue.' A like clause is in the subsequent lease, and, according to the evidence and several reported decisions, is of frequent occurrence in such instruments. We conclude that there is nothing in the terms of the lease which requires that equitable relief be withheld."

So, whatever may be said of the soundness of the principles on which Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. was decided as abstract propositions, it is quite clear that they are no longer applicable in Federal equity jurisprudence to leases of the character here under consideration. The same may be said of Huggins v. Daley, 48 L.R.A. 320, 40 C. C. A. 12, 99 Fed. 606, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 377, which was a suit in equity by the lessee to enforce his rights under a lease materially different from that here involved. Nor would this court refuse specific performance at the suit of the lessee of the lease here under consideration, for the additional reason above mentioned in the decision of the circuit court of appeals in Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. 57 C. C. A. 428, 121 Fed. 674, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 429, and by this court in Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902. Under the surrender clause in the lease now before us, unlike that involved in those cases, it is provided that the option to the lessee to terminate and avoid further liability thereunder shall cease and become absolutely inoperative immediately and concurrently with the institution of any suit in any court of law or equity by the lessee to enforce the same, etc., by the terms of which, upon the commencement of a suit to enforce the lease, the lessee places himself in a position where performance by him can be compelled, and the court can make an efficient decree, and enforce it when made, and not be doing a vain and useless thing. Pucini v. Bumgarner, — Okla. —, 175 Pac. 537.

For aught that was decided in Kolachny v. Galbreath, supra, or any other case in this court, except Brown v. Wilson, — Okla. —, L.R.A. 1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94, infra, or by the Federal courts in the cases cited, the lessee in this lease would be entitled to a decree of specific performance or other equitable relief to enforce or protect his rights acquired thereunder. It has been suggested that Guffey v. Smith, supra, being based upon and following the construction placed upon similar oil and gas leases by the supreme court of Illinois, as to the right acquired by the lessee, should be distinguished and not followed in this jurisdiction, because it is asserted that this court has differently defined the character of interest so acquired by the lessee. What was said in Guffey v. Smith as to the character of the interest acquired by the lessee under the Illinois decision related to the discussion pertaining to the nature of the relief the lessee was seeking, and it was decided that because, under the Illinois decisions, the lessee acquired a present vested right, "a freehold interest," in the premises, the suit was not one in the nature of specific performance of an executory contract, but, in a practical sense, one to prevent waste. For that reason, the rule that a contract cannot be specifically enforced in favor of one, if it cannot be specifically enforced against him, was held by that court not to apply. But the character of the interest of the lessee had no bearing whatever on the question upon which the case is above cited, viz., whether the lease is so unfair and inequitable in its terms that relief in equity should be withheld.

Moreover, there is no substantial difference between the earlier holdings of this court and of the Illinois court as to the character of the interest acquired by the lessee under the instrument here under consideration. We have already defined the character of the right acquired by the lessee under the lease in question. It would prolong this opinion to an unreasonable length to review all the Illinois decisions on the subject, and compare the same with what we have said on the subject. The matter is discussed or referred to in the following Illinois cases: Watford Oil & Gas Co. v. Shipman, 233 Ill. 9, 122 Am. St. Rep. 144, 84 N. E. 53; Gillespie v. Fulton Oil & Gas Co. 236 Ill. 188, 86 N. E. 219, 239 Ill. 326, 88 N. E. 192; Poe v. Ulrey, 233 Ill. 56, 84 N. E. 46; Ulrey v. Keith, 237 Ill. 284, 86 N. E. 696; Bruner v. Hicks, 230 Ill. 536, 120 Am. St. Rep. 332, 82 N. E. 889; Daughetee v. Ohio Oil Co. 263 Ill. 518, 105 N. E. 308.

The propositions stated in those cases may be briefly summarized as follows: (1) That oil and gas are not capable of distinct ownership in place; (2) a grant of oil and gas in situ does not vest title thereto, or any estate therein, or pass anything which can be the subject of ejectment or other real action; (3) the lessee, under the form of lease here involved, acquires the right to go upon the premises, erect and maintain all necessary structures, and explore for oil and gas, and, if found, produce them according to the terms of the lease; (4) a lease being a "conveyance of an interest in land," if upon land occupied as a homestead, the wife must join therein; (5) under a lease containing a clause giving the lessee the right to terminate the same at any time, the lessee cannot have a decree of specific performance—all of which is in harmony with the conclusions of this court. In Illinois it is held that a lease for a definite term of years, and as long thereafter as either oil or gas is produced, is "of unlimited duration," and that such lease, giving the right to enter on land and explore for and produce oil and gas, creates a "freehold interest" in the land. This court has not had occasion to determine whether such right should be termed a "freehold interest," or is limited to a term of years, and therefore "not an incorporeal freehold right in the real estate," as was held by supreme court of West Virginia in State v. South Penn Oil Co. 42 W. Va. 80, 24 S. E. 688. Whether the right be termed a freehold interest or one for years is of no importance. Under the decisions of the Illinois court and of this court, the substantial rights acquired by the lessee are the same. A statute of Illinois (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1905, chap. 94, § 7) provides that "when the owner of any land shall convey, by deed or lease, any mining right therein, such conveyance shall be considered as so separating such right from the land that the same shall be taxable separately." It was held in People ex rel. Carrell v. Bell, 237 Ill. 332, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746, 86 N. E. 593, 15 Ann. Cas. 511, that an oil and gas lease for one year, and as long thereafter as oil or gas was found in paying quantities, conveyed a mining right within the meaning of the statute, and was subject to ad valorem taxation separately. In Re Indian Territory Il- luminating Oil Co. 43 Okla. 307, 142 Pac. 997, while holding an oil and gas lease is property, this court further held that same was not subject to ad valorem taxation separately from the land, our statutes not having so provided. Instead of taxing leases, or such "mining right" ad valorem, by statute in this state a gross production tax is levied in lieu of all other taxes upon leases or mining rights. Sess. Laws 1916, p. 102, chap. 39. Large Oil Co. v. Howard, — Okla. —, — A.L.R. —, 163 Pac. 537. Therefore, the only difference between the decisions of the Illinois court and this court as to the right acquired by the lessee under an oil and gas lease for a definite term, and as long thereafter as oil or gas is produced, is, that court has designated such right "a freehold interest in land," while we have designated it "an interest in land," without saying whether such interest amounts to a freehold; and in the two states such interests are taxed by different methods, which results, not from a difference in conception of the character of the interest, but from the applicable statutes pertaining to taxation thereof. These differences afford no ground for distinguishing the decisions by the supreme court of Illinois, and followed by the court in Guffey v. Smith, that the clause giving the lessee the option to surrender "does not create a tenancy at will, or give the lessor an option to compel a surrender, and does not make the lease void as wanting in mutuality." [237 U. S. 113, 59 L. ed. 863, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526.]

There appears to be some conflict in decisions of the several courts of civil appeals of Texas on the question. There are some decisions by those courts, and there are expressions in others, which support the contention that leases of the character here involved are void for the lack of mutuality. Others of those courts, and all of the expressions of the supreme court of that state to which our attention has been called, are to the contrary. In

National Oil & Pipe Line Co. v. Teel, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 67 S. W. 545, two leases were involved. Each recited a consideration of $1 for the payment of certain stipulated royalties, and provided, if operations were not begun and prosecuted with due diligence within two years, that the grant should become null and void, and further provided that the lessee might prevent such forfeiture from year to year by paying in advance $100 until a well was completed. No time was fixed beyond which the commencement of operations could not be deferred and a forfeiture avoided by the payments for delay. The action was by the lessor against the assignee of the lessee, to cancel, one of the grounds therefor being the alleged fraud of the lessee in procuring the lease. The court of civil appeals affirmed the decree of the trial court canceling the lease, upon the ground that the contract could not be regarded as a sale, but an option, because the real consideration was the development of the property, for which no definite term was fixed; and that the owners might rescind in the absence of any equities, owing to work having been begun, it being held that some time for performance was requisite to an option. It will be noted that the case at bar is distinguishable from that, a fixed time within which a well must be completed being prescribed in the contract here under consideration. However that may be, the supreme court of Texas entertained a different view of the questions decided by the court of civil appeals. In their opinion in the case (95 Tex. 586, 68 S. W. 979), on the question of the validity of option contracts, the supreme court said: "A naked agreement, by which one promises to convey to another an interest in land in consideration of money to be paid or acts to be performed by such other, but which does not bind the other to pay or perform the consideration, as the case may be, cannot be enforced. In such case there is a want of mutuality in the agreement. The one party promises to do something; the other does not promise absolutely to do anything; hence, there is no consideration to support a contract, and it is void. On the other hand, a promise to give an option is valid if supported by an independent consideration. For example, if a sum of money be paid for the option, the promisee may, at his election, enforce the contract. Each of the contracts in this case purports upon its face to have been executed in consideration of the payment of $1; and, though the plaintiff below pleaded that no consideration was paid, there was no evidence that the recitals as to the consideration in the contracts were not true. Whether the recital of '$1,'—commonly called a nominal consideration,—is sufficient to support the contracts, we need not discuss, though there is very high authority for holding that such recital is sufficient for the purpose."

The court thereupon treated the contracts as if supported by a consideration, and affirmed the judgment on the ground of fraud in the procurement thereof.

In Witherspoon v. Staley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 156 S. W. 557, in an action to cancel a mineral lease, the court of civil appeals reversed a judgment denying cancellation, with direction to render judgment for complainants. The lease there involved recited a consideration of $25 paid and certain stipulated royalties, was for a term of five years, and as long thereafter as oil or gas and other minerals were found in paying quantities, and provided that, if operations by drilling or mining were not commenced and prosecuted with due diligence within sixty days, then the grant should become null and void, and also provided that the lessee might prevent such forfeiture from year to year by paying the lessor the sum of $25 every sixty days until operations commenced. Payments for delay were made for a period expiring January 28, 1911. On that date operations had not been commenced, and no further payments for delay were tendered until January 30, 1911, which the lessor refused to accept, and declared the lease at an end. The court held the lease terminated for failure to commence operations and to comply with the condition to prevent same. There was some language used which has been construed as indicating that the lease was void for want of mutuality, though on a former appeal of the same case another court of civil appeals had expressly held the lease was "not void as being unilateral." Witherspoon v. Staley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 1191. In refusing a writ of error to review the last decision, the supreme court (159 S. W. xxiii. made the following notation: "Refused upon the ground that the contract was forfeited. We do not commit ourselves to the proposition that the contract was void merely because it was a contract for an option, and was unilateral in its character, as held by the court of civil appeals. Granting that it was unilateral and a mere contract for an option, it may have been enforceable as such a contract because supported by a consideration paid and limited to a definite time."

See Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 200.

Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. supra, was an action by the lessor for cancelation. The lease was of a tract of 188 acres; recited a consideration of $28.20 paid; was for a term of ten years, and as much longer as oil, gas, and other minerals were produced; provided stipulated royalties to be paid lessor, the lessee agreeing to complete a well in one year or pay $28.20 each three months in advance until the end of the term, or until a well was completed or the lease surrendered; and further provided that the lessee should have the option, upon payment of $5 and all amounts then due thereunder, to surrender the lease for cancelation, and thereafter be discharged from all payments, obligations, and covenants, whereupon the grant should become null and void. The court of civil appeals held the lease void. It construed the contract as vesting no interest in the land, but a mere option; that the lessee was not obligated to develop or make the payments for delay, or to do anything except pay $5 under the surrender clause, which sum it held to be merely nominal and no consideration for the grant. The reason for the conclusion reached by that court is perhaps best expressed in the following portion of the opinion on rehearing: "In this case we think the original payment of $28.20 was a sufficient consideration for the option for the first year, and, since the parties so stipulated, the payment of a like amount was a sufficient consideration for the extension of the lease without development for each three months during which it was paid and accepted, and, in our opinion, appellant could, by the acceptance of said rent at the beginning of each quarter, have bound herself to the end of the term; but, there being no obligation upon the part of appellee to pay the rent, and no binding promise having been made by it to do anything further than to pay $5 and overdue rent whenever it decided to surrender the lease, she was not bound to accept it when tendered at the beginning of any quarter, unless in the meantime appellee had in good faith begun to explore and develop the land."

The supreme court, however, granted a writ of error to review the judgment of the court of civil appeals, making the following notation at the time: "We are of the opinion that the holding that the lease contract was void because unilateral was erroneous. It appears to have been supported by a valuable consideration paid, though it be regarded as a contract for an option and as unilateral in character. A contract to give an option is valid if supported by an independent consideration. We think it questionable, however, whether a contract by which the opposite party agrees to do a definite thing within a limited period, or, in lieu of it, to pay a specified amount, can be regarded as unilateral."

See Pierce Fordyce Oil Asso. v. Woodrum, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 245, 249.

In Pierce Fordyce Oil Asso. v. Woodrum, supra, another of the courts of civil appeals held a lease of a tract of 2,038 acres for a term of one year, and as long thereafter as oil or gas was found in paying quantities, which recited a cash consideration of $1, the lessee agreeing to pay a royalty of one eighth the oil and gas produced, and to begin operations in six months, or pay 50 cents per acre for delay of an additional six months, and granting the lessee the option to surrender the lease at any time upon the payment of $1, was not void as being unilateral. See also Griffin v. Bell, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 202 S. W. 1035, which was an action to cancel a lease, in which the lessee was not obligated to drill or pay for delay, and for which a consideration of $70 was paid. The court of civil appeals affirmed a judgment denying the relief, holding that "the contract was not subject to cancellation on account of its unilateral character on its face, imposing an obligation only on plaintiffs, since mutual promises are necessary only when there is no other consideration."

Notwithstanding some earlier decisions and dictum to the contrary, the later decisions of the courts of civil appeals of Texas, and all of the expressions of the supreme court of that state to which our attention has been called, are in harmony with the great weight of authority that leases of the character in question, though development and prospective royalties be regarded as the moving consideration to the lessor, and it is optional with the lessee whether he shall drill, or pay for delay, or surrender and terminate the agreement, are not void for the want of mutuality, when supported by an independent valuable consideration; and also that $1 is a valuable consideration, and sufficient to support a contract for an option.

There is no finding that the recital in the instrument under consideration of $1 paid as a consideration was a mere formality—a fiction—and was not a statement of the fact of the actual payment and receipt of that sum. It may be true that in some instances no consideration was paid or agreed to be paid, though the instrument recites the payment of $1 or other small sum. On the other hand, that is not always the case. Quite a number of decisions will be found in the books where the recited consideration of $1 for leases of tracts of different areas was found to have been actually paid, and others in which, there being no proof to the contrary, it was assumed that such was the case. Therefore, we cannot assume in this case that the $1 was not one of the considerations, or that the parties did not contract in reference thereto; and we have no right to disregard the $1, and treat the instrument as though the covenant to develop or pay in lieu thereof was the sole consideration. If they so desired, the lessors had the right to dispose of their property, or any interest therein, for $1; and, having acknowledged that they did so, we will not presume that they did not, because of the agreement that under certain conditions they were to receive a further and greater consideration during the life of the grant. Nor will we assume that the consideration is inadequate. There is no finding to that effect, or of facts or circumstances from which the same can be inferred. Moreover, if it should be assumed that the consideration is inadequate, it would not follow that the lessor was entitled to cancellation. This court has repeatedly held that inadequacy of consideration alone is not sufficient to justify a court of equity in canceling

a deed regularly executed. Lewis v. Allen, 42 Okla. 584, 142 Pac. 384; Chandler v. Roe, 46 Okla. 349, 148

Pac. 1026; Miller v. Folsom, 49 Okla. 74, 149 Pac. 1185; Henley v. Davis, — Okla. —, 156 Pac. 337; Welch v. Ellis, — Okla. —, 163 Pac. 321.

In Welch v. Ellis the rule is stated by this court as follows: "Ordinarily, an adult person of sound mind may dispose of his real estate in any manner and for any consideration he sees fit, and the deed therefor will not be set aside, in the absence of fraud, duress, or mistake. Mere inadequacy of price, or any other inequality in the bargain, does not per se constitute a ground to avoid the bargain. Courts of equity, as well as courts of law, act upon the ground that every person who is not, from his peculiar position or circumstances, under disability, is entitled to dispose of his property in such manner and upon such terms as he chooses; and whether his bargains are wise and discreet, or profitable or unprofitable, are considerations, not for courts of justice, but for the party himself, to deliberate upon. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 244."

This court in Miller v. Folsom, 49 Okla. 74, 149 Pac. 1185, in an opinion by Justice Turner in a suit to cancel a deed on the ground of incompetency and inadequacy of consideration, said: "If he was as ignorant of values as the court inferred, the most that can be said is that plaintiff might be likened to one who becomes the owner of a precious stone of unknown value to him, and who sells it for a small part of its value without informing himself of its actual worth. It goes without saying that he must suffer the result of his own folly, and that a court of equity will not aid him to recover the property for the reason that he was chargeable with the duty to inquire of its worth before making the sale. Plaintiff also might be likened to one who is the owner of a field containing a treasure under its soil of which he was ignorant. It cannot be said that equity will set aside his deed conveying it to one who had purchased it, without fraud or undue influence, for a small part of its value."

In Eyre v. Potter, 15 How. 42, 14 L. ed. 592, a suit in equity to cancel a deed, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of the question of the adequacy of the consideration to support the conveyance, said:

"The parties, if competent to contract and willing to contract, were the only proper judges of the motive or consideration operating upon them; and it would be productive of the worst consequences if, under pretexts however specious, interests or dispositions subsequently arising could be made to bear upon acts deliberately performed, and which had become the foundation of important rights in others. Mere inadequacy of price, or any other inequality in a bargain, we are told, is not to be understood as constituting per se a ground to avoid a bargain in equity; for courts of equity, as well as courts of law, act upon the ground that every person who is not, from his peculiar condition or circumstances, under disability, is entitled to dispose of his property in such manner and upon such terms as he chooses; and whether his bargains are wise and discreet, or otherwise, or profitable, or unprofitable, are considerations not for courts of justice, but for the party himself to deliberate upon. Vide Story, Eq. § 244, citing the cases of Griffith v. Spratley, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 383, 29 Eng. Reprint, 1213; Copis v. Middleton, 2 Madd. Ch. 409, 56 Eng. Reprint, 386, 17 Revised Rep. 226, and various other cases.

"Again, it is ruled that inadequacy of consideration is not of itself a distinct principle of equity. The common law knows no such principle. The consideration, be it more or less, supports the contract. Common sense knows no such principle. The value of a thing is what it will produce, and it admits of no precise standard. One man, in the disposal of his property, may sell it for less than another would. If courts of equity were to unravel all these transactions, they would throw everything into confusion, and set afloat the contracts of mankind. Such a consequence would of itself be sufficient to show the injustice and impracticability of adopting the doctrine that mere inadequacy of consideration should form a distinct ground for relief."

In some cases where the consideration for a conveyance or contract is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience, it is held that cancellation will be decreed, not because the price or consideration is inadequate, but because the inadequacy is so great as to amount to evidence of fraud; fraud, and not inadequacy of consideration, being, even in such cases, the ground for the interposition of equity. Bruner v. Cobb, 37 Okla. 228, L.R.A.1916D, 377, 131 Pac. 165. It does not appear from the statement of the issues in this case that cancellation was sought on the ground of fraud in the procurement of the leases, mistake, the capacity of the parties to contract, or their free consent thereto, or any other ground on which the adequacy of the consideration is material. Nor was there any finding of fact to justify a decree of cancellation on any of those grounds.

So far as consideration is concerned, under the issues in this case, the only question to be considered is whether there was any valuable consideration paid, or agreed to be paid, by the lessee to the lessors. Under the findings of the trial court, not only have the lessors failed to discharge the burden imposed on them by statute to show that there was no consideration, but from the recital of the instrument it is seen that there was a consideration, and one of value, in the eyes of the law.

In Brown v. Wilson, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94, it was not held that $1 was not a valuable or sufficient consideration, but, on the contrary, it was distinctly recognized as such. In that case the lease was for a recited consideration of $1 and the covenants and agreements of the lessee therein contained. It was for a term of ten years and as long thereafter as oil or gas was produced. Certain stipulated royalties on the oil and gas produced were provided, and the lessee covenanted to complete a well within four months, or pay at the rate of $80 in advance for each additional three months such completion was delayed; and it also contained a surrender clause. In the majority opinion it was said that the only consideration for the lease, as a whole, was development, and, with reference to the $1, it was said: "We hold that the dollar paid Ruhl [the lessor] at the time of the execution and delivery of the lease was the sole and only consideration paid to hold the lease for the four-month term within which the lessee had to enter and complete a well, and that such consideration did not extend to uphold any other stipulation in the lease; and, further, that the agreement on the part of the lessee to pay delay money after that time was a provision made for the sole purpose of prolonging the lease."

In other words, the "contract" in that case was held to be an agreement to lease for successive quarterly terms, after an initial term of four months, and the payment of, or a binding obligation to pay, a distinct and independent consideration for each succeeding quarter was held essential. By construction, the $1 was held to support the lease for the first term of four months only; and since, as it was held, by reason of the surrender clause the lessee was not obligated to develop or pay the stipulated sum of $80 for each of the succeeding quarters, there was no consideration for the agreement to lease after the first term of four months. Had it been then thought that the $1 supported the lease for the term of ten years instead of only the first four months thereof, it is probable that the majority of this court would have reached a different conclusion in that case on the question now under consideration. The error in that opinion, in this connection, as we now see it, was in the portion we have quoted above, that the $1 consideration supported only a four-months term, and did not extend to and uphold any other stipulation in the lease. That portion of the opinion has been overruled in effect by the recent decision of this court in Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine, — Okla. —, ante, 344, 175 Pac. 533, in which it was said, per Hardy, J.: "The court has no right to fractionize the contract or divide it up into sections, and say that the cash bonus supports any particular covenant to the exclusion of another, when such construction would be contrary to the clear intention of the parties as gathered from the face of their written agreement."

The form of the written agreement in the Branine Case and the one in this is the same. The only difference between the two agreements is as to the amount of the consideration, and, as before stated, that is not material to the questions raised in this case as to the alleged invalidity of the grant for want of consideration. We cannot construe the grant here into one for six months from its date, with an option to extend the same beyond that term for successive monthly periods, without doing violence to the clear intention of the parties as expressed in unambiguous language. Their language is: "It is agreed that this lease shall remain in force for a term of five years from this date and as long thereafter," etc.

That language can have but one meaning. Such meaning is not changed or rendered doubtful by the subsequent covenant that the lessee shall, during that term, complete a well within a specified time or pay for subsequent periods of delay. These subsequent covenants have no bearing on the term of the grant, except in so far as failure to comply therewith may operate as an abandonment, or cause a forfeiture thereof, if the agreement should so provide. No other construction, without doing violence to the plain meaning of the language employed, can be placed on the writing as a whole, than that the recited consideration of $1 is for the grant for the entire term of five years, and as long thereafter as either oil or gas is produced, and also the right of termination given the lessee upon compliance with the conditions thereto attached.

We therefore conclude that the grant or so-called "lease" for the full term expressed is supported by an independent valuable consideration, and is, therefore, not void for want of mutuality, and Brown v. Wilson, supra, holding otherwise, is on this point overruled.

With reference to the right of the lessors to terminate the lease before the expiration of the term, it will be noted that such right is not specifically reserved to the lessors, but is given to the lessee only. But it is contended that the right of the lessor to terminate arises by implication. The argument is that, notwithstanding the grant is to the lessee for a term of five years and as long thereafter as oil or gas is produced, the effect of the surrender clause is to convert the grant into one in the nature of an estate at the will of the lessee, and the statement of Coke (2 Co. Litt. 550) that, "when the lease is made to have and to hold at the will of the lessee, this must be also at the will of the lessor," is invoked to sustain the proposition that, since the lessee has the right to terminate, so also must the lessors. There are decisions based directly or indirectly upon the above dictum of Coke, which apparently sustain the proposition. Knight v. Indiana Coal & I. Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692; Cowan v. Radford Iron Co. 83 Va. 547, 3 S. E. 120, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 453; Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co. 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 234; Reese v. Zinn (C. C.) 103 Fed. 97; Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. (C. C.) 112 Fed. 373, 22 Mor. Min.

Rep. 25; Guffey Petroleum Co. v. Oliver, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 884. However, all courts do not accept Coke's dictum literally and without question. In Tiffany on the Modern Law of Real Property, § 54, p. 138, English and American authorities are cited to support the statement of the author that "if a lease or grant purport to limit an estate to hold at the will of the lessee only,—that is, for so long as the lessee pleases to continue tenant,—the estate created is a freehold or estate for life, determinable at the will of the lessee, and it can be conveyed only by the formalities proper in the case of freehold estates."

In his work on Landlord and Tenant, § 13, p. 102, the author states the rule: "That a lease in terms creating an estate for years contains such an option [i. e., to terminate the tenancy at any time] in the lessee does not render the latter a tenant at will merely."

See also Tiffany, Land. & T. § 12f, p. 84. And in Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co. 72 C. C. A. 213, 140 Fed. 801, speaking of the effect of a right in the lessee to terminate, it was said:

"But that does not make the estate which it creates a mere tenancy at will within the operation of the common-law rule that an estate at the will of one party is equally at the will of the other.

"That rule is without application to a lease for a defined and permissible term, but which reserves to the lessee an option to terminate it before the expiration of the term. Archbold, Land. & T. 92; Dann v. Spurrier, 3 Bos. & P. 399, 127 Eng. Reprint, 218, 7 Revised Rep. 797, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 756; Doe ex dem. Webb v. Dixon, 9 East, 15, 103 Eng. Reprint, 478, 9 Revised Rep. 501."

Tiffany, in his discussion of when a tenancy at will arises (Land. & T. § 13, p. 101), after considering the question in the light of the authorities, states our understanding of the true meaning and proper application of Coke's dictum as follows:

"It has in England apparently, in accordance with these views, been decided that a conveyance to one with a right in him to terminate the holding at any time creates in him a freehold estate. There the estate thus created, in the absence of the insertion of the word 'heirs,' is a life estate merely, terminable at the will of the lessee; while under the rule prevailing in most of the states in this country, that the word 'heirs' is not necessary for the creation of an estate in fee, the estate created would rather be one in fee terminable at the lessee's option, unless the terms of the conveyance show a different intention. There are several cases in this country which tend to support the view that such a conveyance creates an estate for life or in fee.

"Coke's dictum that such a lease, at the will of the lessee, creates a tenancy at will, is, it is conceived, to be regarded as applying only in the absence of livery of seisin, which was in his day necessary for the creation of an estate of freehold. That, if accompanied by livery of seisin, such a lease created an estate for life is clearly asserted by high authority prior to his time, and there is nothing in the decisions referred to by him to lead to a different conclusion. If, however, the instrument lacks any formality of execution, such as a seal, which may be in the particular jurisdiction necessary for the creation of freehold estate, it will, as at common law, when unaccompanied by livery of seisin, create merely an estate at will." Tiffany, Land. & T. pp. 103, 104.

So, if it should be held that the grant here is of a freehold interest in the land, it is valid as such, having been executed with all the formalities necessary, under our statutes, for the conveyance of a freehold estate, and the instrument therefore does not create merely an estate at will. If, on the other hand, the view is taken that the grant is for a definite term, in the nature of an estate for years, the fact that it may be sooner terminated, at the option of the lessee, does not convert the grant from one in the nature of a tenancy for years into one in the nature of a tenancy at will. In either case, the above rule stated by Coke is not applicable. For these reasons we held in Northwestern Oil & Gas Co. v. Branine, — Okla. —, ante, 344, 175 Pac. 533, that the presence of the surrender clause "did not confer on the lessor the right to terminate the lease at will."

Landlord and tenant—lease for term—conversion into lease for years.

It follows that in our opinion the trial court erred in the conclusions of law, and upon the facts found the judgment below should have been for the plaintiff in error.

The judgment is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

All the Justices concur except Turner and Brett, JJ., not participating, and Owen, J., dissenting.

Owen, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in this case. I cannot agree that the $1 mentioned in the lease as part of the consideration is sufficient to support every covenant of the lease for the full term of five years. There was no bonus paid, and, as I construe the lease, the real consideration is the covenant to develop the premises and pay royalties. The language is: "For and in consideration of the sum of $1 to them in hand paid by the said parties of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained on the part of the parties of the second part to be paid, kept, and performed," etc.

Then follows in the usual form, the covenants to develop the premises for oil and gas, and to pay the stipulated royalties in the event either oil or gas is found. If the lease did not contain a surrender clause, the conclusion reached by the majority of the court would be correct. The lessee would be bound by these terms, and this would be a sufficient consideration to support the grant. In the opinion it is stated: "The lessee is obligated thereunder to do one of three things: (1) Drill and complete a well in the fixed time, or (2) surrender all his rights and pay in addition the sum of $1, or (3) pay during the term of five years, or until surrender, $15 per month for each additional month the completion of the well is delayed."

In support of the proposition that the lessee is bound to do one or the other, the cases of Cohn v. Clark, 48 Okla. 500, L.R.A.1916B, 686, 150 Pac. 467, and McKee v. Grimm, — Okla. —, 157 Pac. 308, are cited. As I understand these cases, they hold the lessee was bound to pay rent until he availed himself of the surrender clause. In both cases the action was to recover rentals, there having been no drilling, and the leases had not been surrendered. In Cohn v. Clark, supra, the surrender clause was: "Second party may at any time remove all his property and reconvey the premises hereby granted, and thereupon this instrument shall be null and void."

The lessee had failed to drill, and refused to pay the rentals, and contended that this, ipso facto, canceled the lease, and it was not necessary to reconvey. The court held that, not having reconveyed, he was liable for the rentals due according to the terms of the lease, and that the surrender clause for the benefit of the lessee must be construed in connection with the forfeiture clause for the benefit of the lessor. In the opinion, by Commissioner Mathews, appears the following discussion: "The lessee contends that, in order to relieve himself of liability under the contract, it was unnecessary for him to avail himself of the sixth provision therein, known as the surrender clause, and execute a reconveyance as provided in this clause; but that he was not bound in the contract to begin operations on the lease, or to pay rentals, or to execute a reconveyance, but that upon failure on his part to either begin operations, or to pay the specified rentals as provided in the contract, ipso facto there was a self-executing automatic release, which relieved him of all liability. . . . If the lessee's contention be true, then we would meet the anomalous condition of a party profiting by his own breach or gaining advantage by his own wrong. Under such a contract the lessor binds his hands, and gets nothing for the lease unless the pleasure of the lessee moves him to action. Should we determine that a failure to pay the rentals stipulated, after a default in beginning operations, ipso facto operates to release the lessee from all liability, why encumber the lease with the sixth paragraph, known as the surrender clause? If failure to pay rentals nullifies the lease automatically, then there is no use of the surrender clause at all. It would be useless to insert a surrender clause in a lease, requiring the lessee to go to the trouble and expense of executing an actual reconveyance, when there is a provision in the lease for his advantage which is self-executing upon his failure to pay the rentals. We must construe this contract so as to give some effect and meaning to every part of the same. We are not permitted to say that the parties hereto have deliberately inserted a clause in this contract that is useless and unnecessary, when a fair and reasonable construction will give weight and effect to it; and, following this line, we conclude that if the surrender clause has been inserted in the contract for the benefit of the lessee, and affords him an easy and expeditious way of ridding himself of the contract and its liability, the forfeiture clause in paragraph 1 must have been inserted for the benefit of the lessor only. This construction will give both of the clauses the weight and effect that were reasonably intended for them, and gives both of the parties to the contract a means of protection and a way of relieving themselves of the contract."

In McKee v. Grimm, supra, the lessee alleged that he had offered to comply with the surrender clause. The lessor, by reply, denied this allegation. The opinion holds there was a material issue of fact, with the burden of proof on the lessee, and, failing to prove this affirmative defense, he was liable for the rentals under the authority of Cohn v. Clark, supra.

The lease in question contains a surrender clause, giving the lessee, at any time, on the payment of $1, the right to surrender the lease, after which all payments and liabilities under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine. The error is in holding that the lessee is bound to do one of three things, and that the $1, paid at the time of the execution of the lease, is sufficient consideration to support the option to do either, in addition to supporting the grant for the full term of five years. I do not so understand this contract. The lessee had the option, for which he had paid nothing, to surrender this lease and avoid either drilling or paying rental. Under the express language of this clause, if at any time he decided to avoid the obligations to drill or pay rental, he could do so upon paying $1, not "an additional $1" to the lessor and surrendering the lease for cancelation. This negatives the premise that the $1 originally paid was intended by the parties to pay for the valuable and substantial right to surrender and avoid the expense of development.

At one of the periods mentioned in the lease, at which time the lessee by the terms of the lease, had the option of either drilling or paying rent, or of refusing to do either, and thereby avoid liability, upon the payment of $1, the lessor refused to accept the rental tendered and brought this action to cancel the lease. No bonus had been paid and there had been no attempt at development. The covenants for development and payment of royalties being the real consideration for the lease, the contract, as I view it, was at that time unperformed on the part of the lessee. The $1 mentioned as part of the consideration was merely nominal, and the lessor would not have executed this lease for such consideration.

The courts have repeatedly held that the real and moving consideration for leases of this character is not the nominal consideration paid in advance—that is, the $1 as in this case—but the exploration and development of the land for oil and gas is the real consideration. This announcement has been made so frequently by the courts that a decision construing similar leases can scarcely be found in which such declarations are absent. In the case of Federal Oil Co. v. Western Oil Co. (C. C.) 112 Fed. 373, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 25, the lease under consideration was identical with the one here, in reciting $1 and the covenants to develop as the consideration for its execution. There it was said: "The cash payment, if actually made, was merely nominal, and it is quite apparent, from a consideration of the terms of the whole lease, that the lessors would not have executed it for any such paltry consideration. If there was no further consideration which the lessee was bound to yield to the lessors, a court of equity would be bound to refuse the enforcement of the lease. The consideration would be so trifling, compared with the value of the leasehold interest, as to shock the moral sense. . . . Oil leases stand upon quite different grounds from leases of other immovable property. The governing principle in gas and oil leases of the character in question is that the discovery and production of gas or oil is a condition precedent to the existence and continuance of any vested estate in the demised premises. Where, as in this case, the only consideration is prospective royalties to arise from exploration and development, failure to properly explore and develop the demised premises renders the agreement nudum pactum, and works a forfeiture of the lease, for it is of the essence of such a lease that the work of exploration shall be commenced and prosecuted with promptness."

Under the terms of the lease in question there was no further consideration which the lessee was bound to advance to the lessor. The lessee was not bound to drill, nor was he bound to pay rental. It is begging the question, in my opinion, to say that he was bound to surrender the lease unless he drilled or paid rental. The surrender clause is for lessee's benefit, and is his option, for which he paid nothing, to avoid the covenants in the lease. That is equivalent to saying that binding himself to avoid liability, unless he elected to incur that liability, is sufficient to amount to performance on his part. I agree that if the lease was a performed contract, if the lessee had paid a substantial bonus, or was bound to perform something that would be of substantial benefit to the lessor, in consideration of the five-year grant of an exclusive privilege to explore the premises, then the presence of the surrender clause would not render the contract voidable. The surrender clause does not render a performed contract voidable, but it does render an unperformed contract, without a sufficient consideration, voidable at the option of the lessor where it is voidable at the option of the lessee. A contract is performed when the consideration moving from the lessee to the lessor had been paid or performed, or when the lessee is bound by its terms to pay or perform. Other cases holding prospective royalties to be the moving consideration for execution of leases of like character are: Huggins v. Daley, 48 L.R.A. 320, 40 C. C. A. 12, 99 Fed. 606, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 377; Venture Oil Co. v. Fretts, 152 Pa. 451, 25 Atl. 732, 17 Mor. Min. Rep.

543; Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 44 L.R.A. 107, 29 S. E. 978, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 315; Foster v. Elk Fork Oil & Gas Co. 32 C. C. A. 560, 61 U. S. App. 576, 90 Fed. 178; Gadbury v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 193; Long v. Sun Co. 132 La. 601, 61 So. 684; Great Western Oil Co. v. Carpenter, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 229, 95 S. W. 57; Dill v. Frazee, 169 Ind. 53, 79 N. E. 971; Ohio Oil Co. v. Detamore, 165 Ind. 243, 73 N. E. 907; Jennings-Heywood Oil Syndicate v. Houssiere-Latreille Oil Co. 119 La. 793, 44 So. 601; Murray v. Penn Lubricating Co. 121 Ky. 637, 87 S. W. 1102; Flanagan v. Marsh, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 184, 105 S. W. 424.

In holding that the $1 is sufficient to support every covenant of the lease and for the entire period of five years, it is said "the $1 is a thing of value in the eye of the law." That rule prevails in actions at law, where any consideration of value is sufficient, and where the sufficiency of the consideration will not be inquired into. This is not such an action. This is an action of purely equitable cognizance, and a court of equity will look to the reasonableness of the moving consideration. That was held in the case of Federal Oil Co. v. Great Western Oil Co. supra, where it was said: "Except to the extent of $1, the lessee has yielded no consideration for the lease; nor is it bound by any enforceable promise or covenant, for the breach of which the lessors would have a right of action to compel the payment or yielding of any further consideration whatever. . . . The complainant is under no obligation to pay the monthly rental. . . . The lessors could maintain no action to recover the same if the complainant should refuse to continue payment. Such a lease is without consideration, and must be held nudum pactum and void. A lease so unfair, inequitable, and against good conscience no court ought to enforce."

Other cases to like effect are: Long v. Sun Co. 132 La. 601, 61 So. 684; Huggins v. Daley, 48 L.R.A. 320, 40 C. C. A. 12, 99 Fed. 606, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 377; Berry v. Frisbie, 120 Ky. 337, 86 S. W. 558; Jennings-Heywood Oil Syndicate v. Houssiere-Latreille Oil Co. 119 La. 793, 44 So. 481; Smith v. Guffey, 120 C. C. A. 436, 202 Fed. 106; Murray v. Barnhart, 117 La. 1023, 42 So. 489; Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 193.

It is suggested that the $1 in many instances has been held to support a conveyance of land by warranty deed, and the case of Ehrig v. Adams, — Okla. —, 169 Pac. 645, is cited as authority on this proposition. That was not the question before the court in that case. In that case a restricted Indian had by warranty deed, and for a sufficient consideration, attempted to convey certain land. By reason of the restrictions on alienation that deed was void. Later, and after the restrictions had been removed by operation of law, the same Indian conveyed the same premises to the same grantee, under a deed reciting a consideration of $1. It was contended that the principal consideration for this last deed was, in fact, the consideration received under the first deed, and, the first deed being void, therefore the last deed, based on the same consideration, was void. It was said: "There is no merit in the contention that the deed of July, 1910, was void for the reason that it was supported principally by the consideration received under the deed of 1907. There is no allegation of fraud or want of consideration. The second deed stands as an independent transaction. The allottee being of less than one-half blood, all restrictions upon his powers of alienation of this land were removed by the Act of May 27, 1908. When he saw fit to convey this land to Bratton in 1910 for $1, he was at liberty to do so, without regard to his void deed made prior to this act. The fact that the Indian appears to have been sufficiently honest to recognize and remember the consideration which he had received under the void deed did not impose any restrictions upon his power to alienate."

The sufficiency of the consideration was not in question. The question was whether receiving consideration under a void deed rendered the later deed void. In the instant case the question necessary for determination is whether the lessor had received a sufficient consideration to distinguish this case from the rule that contracts unperformed, without sufficient consideration, which are optional as to one, are optional as to both. It is not contended that the lessee was bound to render a sufficient consideration in the future by developing the premises or paying rentals. He was not bound to do either.

This action to cancel the lease being of purely equitable cognizance, a court of equity must inquire into the sufficiency of the consideration, and must say, as I view the lease, the covenants to develop and pay royalties were the moving consideration from the lessee to the lessor, and the lessee was not bound to perform these. That being true, and there being no development, this case falls squarely within the rule announced in Hill Oil & Gas Co. v. White, 53 Okla. 748, 157 Pac. 710, where it was said, Mr. Justice Hardy speaking for the court: "The rule in this state is that contracts unperformed, without sufficient consideration, which are optional as to one, are optional as to both."

The contract here was unperformed, because no sufficient consideration had been paid, neither was the lessee bound to do anything that would amount to sufficient consideration.

Other cases in which this rule was announced are: Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co. 29 Okla. 719, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 487, 119 Pac. 260; Superior Oil & Gas Co. v. Mehlin, 25 Okla. 809, 138 Am. St. Rep. 942, 108 Pac. 545; Kolachny v. Galbreath, 26 Okla. 772, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 110 Pac. 902; Brown v. Wilson, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94.

Assuming that the $1 mentioned as a part of the consideration was in fact paid, this payment was, in my opinion, wholly inadequate to support the exclusive right to enter and explore for five years, and the lower court did not err in giving the lessor the right to terminate the contract, which was without sufficient consideration, unperformed and optional as to the lessee, and therefore optional as to the lessor.

It is a universal rule that courts will not grant specific performance at the instance of one of the parties to an unperformed contract, who himself is not bound to perform the contract. There is an unbroken line of decisions of this court following that rule. To deny the lessor the right to go into court and by proper action cancel such a contract is to deny him a remedy in the courts of which he might avail himself by force of arms.

I. Introductory.

A lease of land for the production of oil and gas, which, in addition to the usual stipulation for the payment of a cash consideration and covenants for the development of the leased premises and the payment of a royalty on the product secured, or, in lieu thereof, a stated sum of money at designated times, contains a clause permitting the lessee to surrender the lease and be relieved from further liability thereunder, presents the question as to the effect of this surrender clause on the validity of the lease. The contention has frequently been made that the effect of such a clause was to invalidate the lease on the ground of want of mutuality, or at least to render the term of the lessee one at will, terminable by either party in accordance with the rule as to such estates.

Of course, the real consideration for a lease of this character is the covenant of the lessee to develop the premises for oil and gas, although the present cash consideration and the agreement to pay stated sums in lieu of development frequently involve the payment by the lessee of substantial sums of money. In this regard it is to be noted that the obligations imposed upon the lessee are divisible and alternative, but there is nevertheless imposed upon him some obligation which cannot be avoided by him, although, being in the alternative, he may have an election as to the particular obligation which he will assume. The fact that the lease imposes upon the lessee an actual and unavoidable obligation is a matter of importance on the question of mutuality of obligation; for, in this regard, to render the obligation mutual it is not essential that each covenant or agreement by the lessor shall be supported by some specific covenant or agreement by the lessee. It is sufficient if the contract contains mutual obligations binding upon both parties. The benefits accruing or the duties imposed need not be equal. The obligation is mutual, even though the subsidiary promises depend for their support upon the consideration of the principal agreement. If this consideration is sufficient, mutual promises are not essential.

Tested by this standard, an important feature of contracts of this character is the fact that the lessor has no property in the oil or gas in his land, until it has been drawn therefrom by wells operated in his behalf. The development of wells for this purpose requires the expenditure by the lessee of large sums of money, without any definite assurance of success. There is, therefore, no particular hardship upon the lessor in the provision entitling the lessee to be relieved from the burdens imposed by the lease, upon surrendering the same; at least, where he pays a valuable consideration therefor. This is especially true, in view of the general rule of equity that there is an implied covenant on the part of the lessee that he will use reasonable diligence to develop the leased premises, to the extent, at least, of protecting the land from the danger of having any oil or gas therein drawn through wells on adjacent lands, and in this manner lost to the lessor.

II. General rule.

In accordance with the general principles referred to, with reference to the test to determine the validity of a contract as affected by the question of mutuality of obligation imposed thereby, by the great weight of authority a lease of land for the development and production of oil and gas is not rendered invalid on the ground of want of mutuality, by inclusion therein of a provision, in effect entitling the lessee to surrender the lease and be relieved from further liability, especially where he is required, as a condition of the surrender, to pay some designated sum of money; the consideration for the lease being otherwise sufficient, although not expressly referable to the surrender clause. And the term created by the lease is not a tenancy at will, terminable at the pleasure of either party; but in these respects, the lease is valid and binding upon the parties, according to its terms.

Archer* (1919) — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 554.

In Rechard v. Cowley (Ala.) supra, it is said that it is supposed that "this privilege, with its attendant rights of limited entry and possession, was open to be availed of by the 'lessee' for twelve months, and for a longer period in certain circumstances defined in the writing. The 'lessee' did not engage, did not bind himself, to explore for oil and gas at any time or within any period short of one year, and that in the alternative; but this absence of obligation to explore, etc., within a period not beyond one year or alternatively, did not affect the contract with anything unfavorable or fatal to its validity. He paid an effective consideration (though nominal) for this right, this privilege, and it was his to enjoy and to avail of approximately nine months (of the twelve stipulated) after this bill was filed, within three months after the 'lease' had been executed and delivered and recorded. The 'lessee' did not oblige himself to find oil and gas, or to make the effort so to do, within the period during which the successor of the owner impleaded him in this cause. It is supposed that the insertion in the contract of the reservation of right in the 'lessee' to surrender the 'lease' and cancel the contract operated to affect, and thus avoid, the contract with a want of mutuality. This reservation vested in the 'lessee' an option to determine the contract, which, for a consideration, had clothed the 'lessee' with the privilege stated. This option in the 'lessee' to cancel was supported by the consideration that vested in him the right, the privilege, of prospecting for oil and gas on the land described in the instrument, in consequence of which it necessarily results that the contract was not wanting in mutuality. The fact that one may, at his election, surrender a right (not avoid an obligation) which he has for a consideration acquired, could not justify the conclusion that the right for which he paid never was his to surrender."

In Central Ohio Natural Gas & Fuel Co. v. Eckert (1904) 70 Ohio St. 127, 71 N. E. 281, it is said that such a lease does not create a mere tenancy at will. There is a good and valid consideration for the option granted by such instruments, and it is immaterial whether they are called leases, deeds, or written agreements. The intention of the parties is to control, and it is manifest that it was not the intention of either party that the right granted by the instrument should be a mere license, and subject to be terminated by the grantor at any time.

And in Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co. (1905) 72 C. C. A. 213, 140 Fed. 801, it is said that a provision entitling the lessee to reconvey the premises at any time, and relieve himself from further obligation under the lease, does not make the estate created a mere tenancy at will within the operation of the common-law rule that an estate at will of one party is equally at the will of the other, since the rule is without application to a lease for a definite term, although it reserves to the lessee the option to terminate it before the expiration thereof.

a. In general.

The foregoing rule is based upon the assumption that the consideration to be paid or performed by the lessee is sufficient to support the contract. An important question arises as to what is a sufficient consideration within this rule. It has been held that where the consideration for a lease of this character was merely the covenant on the part of the lessee to develop the premises and produce oil or gas if the development was successful, or to pay a certain sum of money at designated times in lieu of such development, a surrender clause, entitling the lessee to be relieved from all liability under the lease by surrendering the same, was invalid on the ground of lack of mutuality, the contract being wholly executory, and the effect of the lease being merely to create a tenancy at will, terminable at the pleasure of either party. Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co. (1899) 47 W. Va. 84, 84 S. E. 923, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 234; Trees v. Eclipse Oil Co. (1899) 47 W. Va. 107, 34 S. E. 933, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 260.

In Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn

Oil Co. (W. Va.) supra, it is pointed out that according to the claim of the lessee he was not bound to do anything or pay anything, until eighteen months from the date of the lease, and in the meantime he has the right to surrender it and thereby be released from any obligation whatever. The court said: "This renders it to this extent nudum pactum by which the lessor is not bound any more than the lessee, and until something is done in consummation thereof, either party may terminate it. 'If one party may terminate an estate at his will, so may the other. Right to terminate is mutual.' . . . The lessee was out nothing, at no expense, and running no risk, and yet he makes the conditions of his contract such that the lessor cannot tell for eighteen months whether the contract is to be binding on the lessee or not. In the meantime he receives nothing for his delay."

The leases involved in the foregoing cases required the payment of no present cash consideration, and imposed on the lessee no obligation to pay any sum of money whatsoever as a condition to surrendering the leases. In the majority of cases heretofore considered, as will be hereinafter more specifically pointed out, there was some present cash consideration running to the lessor for the lease, and the lessee was bound to pay a designated sum of money as a condition of availing himself of the surrender clause. It is clear that where the lease is supported by a substantial consideration, the existence of a surrender clause does not render it invalid on the ground of lack of mutuality. As, for example, where there is a present cash consideration of $2,100. Eastern Oil Co. v. Beatty (1918) — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 104; or $320, Carter Oil Co. v. Tiffin (1918) — Okla. —, 176 Pac. 912. And see Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. infra. And the same rule also applies where the surrender clause requires the payment of a substantial sum of money as a condition to taking advantage of it. Houssiere Latreille Oil Co. v. Jennings-Haywood Oil Syndicate (1905) 115 La. 107, 38 So. 932 ($100).

tion is not sufficient to support a contract unless it is sufficient in amount to constitute a serious consideration. Under this rule it is held that a gas and oil lease cannot be sustained where the recited consideration is only $1, and it contained a provision entitling the lessee to surrender the lease at any time upon the payment of a further sum of $2. Murray v. Barnhart (1906) 117 La. 1023, 42 So. 489. To the same effect see Long v. Sun Co. (1913) 132 La. 601, 61 So. 684, where the surrender clause did not require the lessee to pay anything as a condition to availing himself thereof, and the recited consideration for the lease itself, including the option to cancel, was $1. Such a lease, however, is valid where the lessee is required to pay $100 as a condition of availing himself of the surrender clause. Houssiere Latreille Oil Co. v. Jennings-Haywood Oil Syndicate (1905) (La.) supra. Partial performance by the lessee, and the receipt by the lessor of substantial sums of money after the lessee has partially developed the premises, have been held to cure any defect or invalidity due to want of mutuality of the obligation. Busch-Everett Co. v. Vivian Oil Co. (1911) 128 La. 886, 55 So. 564; McClendon v. Busch-Everett Co. (1916) 188 La. 722, 70 So. 781.

1. In general.

The question as to whether or not $1 is a sufficient consideration to support a lease of this character has been the subject of considerable contest. In the following cases $1 has been held to be a sufficient consideration, even though the lessee was not required to pay any additional sum in order to be entitled to avail himself of the surrender clause:

Marks* (1917) 241 Fed. 139; Raydure v. Lindley (1918) 161 C. C. A. 585, 249 Fed. 675, affirming (1917) 289 Fed. 928, writ of certiorari denied in (1918) 247 U. S. 513, 62 L. ed. 1243, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580.

In Gillespie v. Fulton Oil & Gas Co. (1908) 236 Ill. 188, 86 N. E. 219, the court said that it was unbelievable that the money consideration stated ($1) was the real consideration upon which the lease rested, and that undoubtedly the real consideration was the exploitation of the mineral resources of the property to which the lease related.

And the validity of leases of this character has also been sustained where, in addition to the payment of a present cash consideration, the lessee agreed to pay merely a nominal sum as a condition to exercising the right to surrender the lease. Shaffer v. Marks (1917) 241 Fed. 139; Raydure v. Lindley (1918) 161 C. C. A. 585, 249 Fed. 675, affirming (1917) 239 Fed. 928.

In the foregoing cases the present cash consideration was also $1. To the same effect are RICH v. DONAGHEY (reported herewith), ante, 352, and NORTHWESTERN OIL & GAS CO. v. BRANINE (reported herewith), ante, 344;

Eastern Oil Co. v. Beatty (1918) — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 104; Southwestern Oil Co. v. Bechtel (1918) — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 108.

In Shaffer v. Marks (Fed.) supra, it is held that as to a lease entered into prior to the decision of the Oklahoma court, in Brown v. Wilson (1916) — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917B, 1184, 160 Pac. 94, the existence of the surrender clause in an oil and gas lease, giving the lessee the right to surrender the lease and be relieved from further liability thereunder upon the payment of $1, did not invalidate the lease. In this connection attention is called to Ardizzone v. Archer (1919) — Okla. —, 177 Pac. 554, holding that the assignee from the lessee of an oil and gas lease was liable for the amount required to be paid monthly in lieu of development, although the lease contained a surrender clause, since such clause did not render the lease invalid for want of mutuality. The court said that the case of Brown v. Wilson was overruled on this point. See reference to Brown v. Wilson (Okla.) infra. On the other hand, it has been held that neither the sum of $2 (J. M. Guffey Petroleum Co. v. Oliver (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 884), nor $5 (Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 192) was a sufficient consideration to support the surrender clause, since either sum was merely nominal. And in Owens v. Corsicana Petroleum Co. (Tex.) supra, the present cash consideration was $28.28. The court said that this sum merely represented the consideration for the right to develop the premises for the first period, and the other similar sums provided for were merely a consideration for delay in development for a sufficient term. The court said that there was no obligation on the part of the lessee to pay the delay money, and no abiding obligation to pay any other sum than the $5 to be paid on surrendering the lease; hence, the lessor was not bound to accept the delay money when tendered at the beginning of any quarterly period, unless in the meantime the lessee had in good faith begun to explore and develop the land. Compare with Eastern Oil Co. v. Beatty and Carter Oil Co. v. Tiffin, supra.

In Pierce Fordyce Oil Asso. v. Woodrum (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 245, it is said that the supreme court of Texas granted a writ of error in the Owens Case, with the notation that it was of the opinion that the holding in that case that the leased contract was void, because unilateral, was erroneous, and the opinion was expressed that "it appears to have been supported by a valuable consideration paid, though it be regarded as a contract for an option and as unilateral in character. A contract to give an option is valid if supported by an independent consideration. We think it questionable, however, whether a contract by which the opposite party agrees to do a definite thing within a limited period, or in lieu of it to pay a specified amount, can be regarded as unilateral."

And in Roberts v. McFadden (1903) 32 Tex. Civ. App. 47, 74 S. W. 105, it was held that whether the $1 consideration paid in the lease was not in fact paid, and the only consideration for the lease was the agreement to develop the premises and deliver a portion of the product secured thereby to the lessor and the lessee therein, the right to surrender the lease at any time upon the payment of $1, the sum to be full compensation for interest sustained, the lease was unilateral and void. And in Great Western Oil Co. v. Carpenter (1906) 43 Tex. Civ. App. 229, 95 S. W. 57, the court said that, even if the $1 consideration in an oil and gas lease was actually paid, it was merely nominal and would not of itself support the contract.

eration for a lease is $1 it supports only the original grant, and does not extend to and support an agreement by which the lessee is authorized to surrender the lease upon the payment of $1, and be relieved from further liability thereunder. This case on this point, however, is overruled by RICH v. DONAGHEY (reported herewith), ante, 352, and NORTHWESTERN OIL & GAS Co. v. BRANINE (reported herewith), ante, 344.

2. Enforcement in equity.

While $1 may be a sufficient consideration to support a contract that depends for its validity only upon its being based upon a valuable consideration, $1 consideration, however, has been held not to be sufficient to entitle the lessee to specifically enforce a lease in equity against the lessor, where the lessee has the option to surrender the lease and be relieved from all liability thereunder. Watford Oil & Gas Co. v. Shipman (1908) 233 Ill. 9, 122 Am. St. Rep. 144, 84 N. E. 53; Ulrey v. Keith (1908) 237 Ill. 284, 86 N. E. 696; Dill v. Frazee (1907) 169 Ind. 53, 79 N. E. 971. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, has held that where a lease of this character creates an interest in the lessor's land, as it does in Illinois, the lessee is entitled to invoke the aid of equity to protect his interest in the land, although the effect of such protection is to enforce the lease. Guffey v. Smith (1914) 237 U. S. 101, 59 L. ed. 856, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526. In this regard the court refused to be bound by the Illinois decisions, pointing out the distinction, that the relief given in form is to protect the lessee's interest in the estate granted, and not specifically to enforce the contract.

v.
J. P. AVANT.

Alabama Supreme Court — November 28, 1918.

(— Ala. —, 80 So. 497.)

Carriers — free transportation of policemen — evidence of right — badge as uniform.

1. The badge of a plain-clothes member of a city police force, although worn concealed, is a uniform within the meaning of a municipal ordinance requiring street car companies to transport free, members of the police force when in uniform.

Courts — jurisdiction — de minimis non curat lex.

2. Where the construction of a municipal ordinance under which a city policeman claims a right to ride free on the street cars is in issue, the fact that the action is to recover only a few fares does not deprive the court of jurisdiction under the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex."

Statutes — construction — last antecedent.

3. The rule that in construing statutes and ordinances qualifying words, phrases, and clauses are to be applied to the words, phrases, and clauses immediately preceding, and are not to be extended to or include other words, phrases, and clauses more remote, is not applicable, if such extension or inclusion is clearly required by the intent and meaning of the context or disclosed by the entire act or ordinance.

— position of words in sentence.

4. In construing statutes and ordinances, where general words occur at the end of a sentence, they refer to and qualify the whole, while if they are in the middle of a sentence, and apply to a particular branch of it, they are not to be extended to that which follows.

5. Contemporaneous construction does not control when the intention of the statute or ordinance is plain, unambiguous, and not susceptible to different or contrary reasonable constructions.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — free transportation — construction.

6. Officers of the police force must be in uniform to receive free transportation, under an ordinance requiring such transportation for "officers and patrolmen of the police force and all members of the fire department when in uniform."

— ordinance — contemporaneous construction — acting under ordinance.

7. Long recognition by a street car company and city officers of the badge of a plain-clothes man as a uniform, entitling him to free transportation on the street cars under a city ordinance is an aid to the interpretation of the ordinance as contemporaneous construction.

— binding effect of practical construction.

8. A street car company may be bound by the construction which it places upon a municipal ordinance requiring it to transport police officers free of charge, by acting under it for a long period of time.

Constitutional law — impairment of contract — construction of ordinance.

9. Construing a municipal ordinance requiring free transportation by a street car company of policemen when in uniform, to include plain-clothes men wearing a badge, does not unconstitutionally interfere with the contract rights of the street car company.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover street car fares. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Rushton, Williams, & Crenshaw for appellant.

Mr. G. F. Mertins for appellee.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal is from a judgment for defendant in an action for street car fare.

The testimony showed that on the dates named in the complaint defendant had ridden on the cars of the plaintiff without paying the customary fare for each passage required of passengers on plaintiff's cars.

The testimony for defendant tended to show he was a detective or "plain-clothes man" on the police force of the city of Montgomery, and as such had not been required to pay for his passage on said cars until a short time before the suit was brought, when the manager of plaintiff company refused to issue a book of passes to him. There was testimony to the effect that, about the time plaintiff's company refused to issue further passes to defendant, a controversy had arisen between the officials of that company and defendant, growing out of a discontinuance by defendant at his home of the lighting service of plaintiff. Defendant, as a "plain-clothes man" or detective for the city, wore civilian clothes, and not a suit or uniform, but a metal badge. The only uniform prescribed by the board of public safety for "plain-clothes men" was a metal badge, which may be worn concealed. It was also in evidence that some of the conductors of plaintiff company had permitted defendant to ride upon displaying his said badge.

Defendant introduced an ordinance of the city of Montgomery, relating to plaintiff company or its predecessors in right or title (approved April 3, 1906), providing, in the event of consolidation of certain street car companies of the city of Montgomery, that certain privileges be granted to certain officials of the city. Section 12 thereof is as follows: "That said consolidated company, its successors and assigns, shall furnish free of charge, tickets or passes to the mayor and aldermen of the city and to all other executive officers, upon application from the mayor, and transport officers and patrolmen of the police force, and all members of the fire department, free, when in uniform."

The construction of said section of the ordinance is the question for decision. The maxim, "De minimis non curat lex," does not apply. Courts—jurisdiction—de minimis non curat lex. Grunzfelder v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 164 App. Div. 928, 149 N. Y. Supp. 437; Rothschild v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 162 App. Div. 532, 147 N. Y. Supp. 1040.

The doctrine of the "last antecedent" clause, that relative and qualifying words, phrases, or clauses are to be applied to the words, phrases, or clauses immediately preceding, and as not extending to or including other words, phrases, or clauses more remote, is subject to the important qualification that such extension or inclusion must be clearly required by the intent and meaning of the context or disclosed by a consideration of the entire act or ordinance. State ex rel. Crow v. St. Louis, 174 Mo. 125, 61 L.R.A. 593, 73 S. W. 623; Warner v. King, 267 Ill. 82, 86, 107 N. E. 837; Citizens' Bank v. Parker, 192 U. S. 73, 86, 48 L. ed. 346, 356, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 181; State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 196 Ala. 570, 72 So. 99; 36 Cyc. 1123, and authorities.

Mr. Sutherland said on the subject: "A relative word will not be read as representing the last antecedent exclusively, where the sense of the context and the clear intention of the lawmaker require it to represent several or one more remote.

Fisher v. Connard, 100 Pa. 63, 69; Gyger's Estate, 65 Pa. 311; State v. Jernigan, 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 18; Simpson v. Robert, 35 Ga. 180. The grammatical rule, which is also the legal rule, in construing statutes, was held to be that, where general words occur at the end of a sentence, they refer to and qualify the whole; while, if they are in the middle of a sentence, and sensibly apply to a particular branch of it, they are not to be extended to that which follows." 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 409; Rex v. Shipton, 8 Barn & C. 94, 108 Eng. Reprint, 977.

To the same effect is the announcement of this exception in Endlich on Statutes: "The strict rule of grammar would seem to require, as a general thing, a limiting clause, or phrase, following several expressions to which it might be applicable, to be restrained to the last antecedent. . . . But this technical grammatical rule is liable to be displaced wherever the subject-matter requires a different construction, in obedience to the principle elsewhere discussed, that rules of that character are subordinated to a common-sense reading of an enactment. . . . Indeed, in most cases it will be found, on some ground of this sort, that where several words are followed by a general qualifying expression which is as much applicable to the first as to the last, that expression is not limited to the last, but applies to all. Great Western R. Co. v. Swindon & C. R. Co. L. R. 9 App. Cas. 787, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1075, 32 Week. Rep. 957. . . . Similarly, where words occur at the end of a section, it is said that they are presumed to refer to and to qualify the whole." Coxson v. Doland, 2 Daly, 66; Hart v. Kennedy, 14 Abb. Pr. 432; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 414, pp. 581-584.

See also id. §§ 81 and 82, pp. 110-112; Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, pp. 70 et seq., 106, 121, 150, §§ 49, 56, 65.

The doctrine of contemporaneous construction of the ordinance and of § 12 thereof, as embracing all firemen and all officers and patrolmen of the police force, when not in uniform, has no application. Such rule of construction cannot govern when the intention of the statute or ordinance is plain, unambiguous, and not susceptible to different or contrary reasonable constructions. Twin Tree Lumber Co. v. Ensign, 193 Ala. 113, 119, 69 So. 525; Gadsden & A. U. R. Co. v. Gadsden Land & Improv. Co. 128 Ala. 510, 29 So. 549; Ex parte Stollenwerck, — Ala. —, 78 So. 454; First Nat. Bank v. McAleer, — Ala. —, 81 So. —.

The requirements of this section of the ordinance of the traction company are: (1) To furnish free of charge tickets and passes to the mayor and aldermen, and all other executive officers of the city, upon application from the mayor; (2) to transport free of officers and patrolmen of the police force "when in uniform;" (3) and to transport free all members of the fire department "when in uniform."

Was the defendant in uniform when the demand was made on him for "fare" for his transportation and when he was so transported by plaintiff? It is in answer to this inquiry that the rule of contemporaneous construction has a field of operation under § 12 of the ordinance. The uniforms of firemen and officers thereof, and of the officers and the several classes of patrolmen, were prescribed by appropriate municipal authority. The witness said that the uniform of a "plain-clothes man" or of a city detective was and is the badge worn by defendant and exhibited to the traction company's conductor when he was transported by it, and for which the charge was demanded and refused, and for which collection is sought by the instant suit. The "badge" of a detective or "plain-clothes man" was the only uniform or insignia of authority prescribed by the governing authority of the city having control of such official, required to be worn and exhibited by that official on demand. Such badge had been long recognized by the traction company and the city officers as his "uniform" and as entitling such official to free transportation by defendant company and its predecessors in title of the street car company. Such contemporaneous construction is an aid in determining the meaning of, and defining the effect of, the words of the ordinance, "when in uniform." Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, p. 31, § 20; Endlich, Interpretation of Stat. §§ 357 et seq.; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. §§ 472 et seq. This construction is of binding effect on the defendant traction company, and also is in harmony with the general plan and purpose of the ordinance to secure efficient service to the city and its citizens in the protection of their personal and property rights, and necessary to the good order of the municipal government.

It is not reasonable to insist that the municipality and the traction company or companies, when procuring and granting the ordinance and its provision in question, did not intend and consent to embrace and extend to all of the class of officials for which free transportation was contracted and deemed necessary to an efficient fire and police protection. This provision of the ordinance does not authorize the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the mayor in making his requests for tickets and passes for officers falling within the first class, nor on the part of the traction company in acceding to a request so made by the mayor under this ordinance provision. So, also, there is no justification for a discriminatory or arbitrary exercise of this right of free transportation to which officers, patrolmen, and members of the police force or of the fire department are entitled while in the uniform prescribed for them by the duly constituted city authority. This free transportation is provided for and guaranteed to them as officials in the due discharge of duty by the unambiguous provisions of § 12 of the ordinance. This construction of the ordinance abrogates no contract right secured by the state (Ala. Const. §§ 222, 228; Weller v. Gadsden, 141 Ala. 642, 37 So. 682, 3 Ann. Cas. 981; Mitchell v. The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Evidence of right to free transportation on public conveyance.

- I. Scope of note, 387.
- II. General rule, 388.
- III. Application of rule:
  - a. Private individual, 389.

I. Scope of note.

This note is confined to a discussion of the evidence necessary to be submitted by a passenger to the conductor or other proper servant of the carrier, to establish the passenger's right to free transportation. While passes are included, although they may be based on some consideration, commutation and reduced-fare tickets are not within the scope of the note.

II. General rule.

It may be stated as a broad general rule that, regardless of a person's right to free transportation by law, contract, or otherwise, since a conductor, by the very nature of his duties to the public and the carrier, has no time to become a trier of fact, and cannot stop to investigate the rights which a passenger may have aside from the evidence of such right then presented by him to the conductor, a person entitled to free transportation must present to the conductor or other proper servant of the carrier sufficient evidence of his right, such as a pass, whenever he attempts to exercise such a right.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Copeland (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 55, 42 S. W. 239, an action for damages for wrongful removal from a passenger train, it appeared that there was a contract between the parties for the shipment of certain cattle, which provided that the shipper should have free transportation and should sign the contract in designated places. The plaintiff had failed to sign in that place which evidenced his right to travel over the route he was traveling when ejected, and the conductor refused to accept his contract as evidence of his right to travel, in the absence of the required signature, and caused him to leave the train on his refusal to pay a fare. It was held that a ticket or pass does not, in all instances, furnish the exclusive right to the passenger to transportation, but that under certain circumstances the contract between the passenger and the agent of the carrier may be looked to in order to ascertain the rights of the passenger, the court saying: "The carrier rests under the duty to the passenger to furnish him with a ticket correctly stating the terms of the contract, and the passenger can, in the absence of actual notice to the contrary, assume that this duty has been observed; and in such a case he will not be charged with the duty of inspecting the ticket in order to see that the carrier has performed its duty. This is essentially a fair rule, for the passenger has little, if any, authority in prescribing the form of the ticket and what it shall state in substance. The carrier reserves to itself the right to furnish the ticket and what it shall state, and when the carrier retains this right without granting an equal privilege to the passenger to participate in furnishing the evidence of his right of transportation, it is nothing but fair that the passenger should not be made to suffer for any mistake or failure of duty upon the part of the carrier in furnishing him with a ticket embracing the true terms of the contract. The general rule that one shall be governed by the terms of the written contract which he is a party to, and is presumed, in becoming a party to it, to understand and assent to all of its terms, does not always apply in cases of this character; for in truth, whatever may be the theory to the contrary, the passenger and the carrier do not always stand upon an equal footing. A ticket which seeks to contravene or limit the rights of the passenger, as agreed upon in the contract actually made, is an unreasonable imposition, which should receive no more recognition in law than any other unreasonable regulation or contract of the carrier; and those of the latter class are never permitted to go unchallenged or condemned by the courts."

a. Private individual.

In Knopf v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. (1889) 85 Va. 769, 8 S. E. 787, an action of trespass on the case for wrongful ejection from one of the defendant railroad's passenger trains, on which the plaintiff claimed the right to be transported by virtue of a contract between the railroad and the firm of which he was a member, which contract provided that for and in consideration of $1, and for the further consideration of a "ticket," entitling either of the firm, but only one on any train, to occupy one seat and travel on the defendant's passenger trains between two designated stations without charge, the railroad was to have certain rights in the firm's land. Although the railroad had issued an annual pass to the firm, and, upon application, a renewal "ticket" was issued, at the time of plaintiff's ejection the renewal ticket had expired and no further application had been made to the company, so that the plaintiff offered no ticket to the conductor or evidence of any kind of his right to ride. It was held that the right of the firm to free transportation was not only restricted to one member of the firm at a time, but the evidence of that right was to be a "ticket," to be presented to the conductor of every train upon which any one of the firm should take passage during the continuance of the contract, the question whether it was the duty of the railroad to issue renewals without application therefor being left to the jury on the evidence, and the finding was for the defendant.

In Erie & P. R. Co. v. Douthet (1878) 88 Pa. 243, 32 Am. Rep. 451, the action was to recover damages for breach of an agreement to furnish the plaintiff for life, with a pass for himself and family in part consideration for a right of way over plaintiff's land. The court in its discussion remarked that a mere contract to ride free of charge would subject both parties to inconvenience, and that the company would be liable to suits through the mistakes or ignorance of their servants, or the plaintiff, without the evidence of his right, might be refused often when his business might be most urgent.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Herring (1870) 57 Ill. 59, an action for injuries received by the alleged use of unnecessary force in ejecting the plaintiff from the defendant railroad's train, it appeared that the plaintiff, when asked by the conductor for a ticket, offered him a piece of paper with some writing thereon, which, she testified, had been given to her by some person as a pass, whereupon the conductor told her that the paper was not a pass and was worthless, and, after her refusal to pay a fare, ejected her from the train. It was held that as the plaintiff had no pass, on being informed of that fact by the conductor, she should have either paid her fare or left the train at the first station, if required to do so, and if she refused to comply with his request the conductor had the right to compel her to leave, and use the force necessary for that purpose.

In Elliott v. Western & A. R. Co. (1877) 58 Ga. 454, it appeared that by the terms of a pass used by the plaintiff it was nontransferable, and that the bearer, upon accepting the privileges of the "ticket," assumed all risk of accidents, and expressly agreed that the company would not be liable, under any circumstances, for any injury to the person, or for any loss or injury to the property, of the passenger using the ticket. The plaintiff refused to sign the agreement on the back, when required to do so by the conductor, and was ejected on his refusal to pay fare. It was held that the action of the trial court, setting aside a verdict for the plaintiff and granting a new trial, would not be interfered with.

In Western Maryland R. Co. v. Lynch (1896) 82 Md. 233, 34 Atl. 40, wherein it appeared that one, attempting to ride free over a portion of defendant's railroad over which the company had refused to grant him a right to ride free, produced a copy of his contract with the company for free passage over certain other lines as the evidence of his right to travel. The defendant railroad contended that the conductor was justified in ejecting the plaintiff, because he was attempting to travel without any evidence of his right to transportation, and that if, under his contract, he was entitled to free transportation on the road in question it was a breach of contract to deny him a pass on that road, and his remedy was an action on the contract. The court, however, did not pass on this contention, but held that the contract did not give him such right.

In Broyles v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1910) 166 Ala. 616, 139 Am. St. Rep. 50, 52 So. 81, an action against a railroad for personal injuries sustained by a person riding on a pass belonging to another, the conductor who allowed the plaintiff to ride on the pass without question was asked as a witness at the trial: "What must a passenger have to entitle him to ride on the train?" The court held that it was not error to receive the conductor's answer: "You have to have a ticket, cash fare, or pass, or something the conductor can turn into headquarters, showing that passenger was entitled on that train."

In Graham v. Pacific R. Co. (1877) 66 Mo. 536, it appeared that the plaintiff while traveling on a stock pass was ejected because of an honest misunderstanding by the conductor as to his orders. It also appeared that the plaintiff did not intend to use the pass to the destination named therein, but expected to leave the train at an intermediate station, although he was actually on his return trip. It was held that an instruction that if the pass was in full force and the conductor refused to honor it, and the plaintiff left in obedience to the conductor's command, there was in law an ejection and no excuse for the expulsion, was not improper.

In Brown v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1877) 64 Mo. 536, it appeared that the plaintiff had a contract with the defendant railroad which authorized the owner of stock to be shipped and one or two employees to ride on the train, and it was shown that the agents of the company were authorized to issue passes to the owner and employees for their return. By the terms of the contract in question, it was provided that no person except the owner or persons in charge should be entitled to a return pass, the intent being declared to be to enable the owner or his men in charge, as expressed in the contract, and no other person, to return on the pass. The plaintiff procured a pass for his wife on this contract, by virtue of his false statement that his wife was a part owner of the stock. The conductor on the return trip refused to recognize the validity of the pass of the wife, and ejected her on her refusal to pay a fare. It was held that the claim for damages arising out of this transaction was totally without merit, as the pass was procured knowingly by fraud, the court saying: "The bare statement of the facts would appear sufficient to show the want of all merit in the plaintiff's claim. It is based on a successful attempt to procure from the agent of the railroad company, passes to which, as the applicant and agent both knew, the applicant was not entitled. The printed contract and regulations attached to it were clear that, under these special stock contracts, females were not entitled to passes. When, therefore, Brown represented his wife to be part owner, with a view to furnish the agent with a plausible excuse for his breach of authority, he admitted that upon his own construction and knowledge of the transportation contract he could not pass his wife as an employee. The agent had no authority to issue passes to a lady on a stock contract, and Mrs. Brown and her child could not and did not pretend to exercise any supervision over the stock at the commencement or during the continuance of the trip; and the plaintiff admitted that his statement in regard to her interest in the stock was false, and she had no other interest than such as she had in all his personal property. There is no difficulty in distinguishing this case from cases where an agent exceeds his authority, which is a general one, and its limitations are unknown to the party dealing with him. The contract itself and the regulations printed on it, and the form of the pass issued, could not be misunderstood. A party dealing with the agent in this case was a party to the fraud committed on the principal. In regard to the place where the conductor handed the lady off the train, the inconvenience might undoubtedly justify damages in a case where there was a real expulsion; but the train stopped at Paris, where the conductor proposed that Mrs. Brown should get off, and where she only refused to get off at the suggestion of her husband, who was bent on getting up a case for damages, and therefore insisted she should stay on the cars until she was put off. The testimony of Mrs. Brown acquits the conductor of any incivility whatever, and states, too, in her own language, that he acted 'very gently.' And it was obviously Mr. Brown's intention to pay the fare as soon as he was satisfied that his wife could not proceed on the train without doing so, and he could get the conductor to put her off, we are unable to perceive any grounds upon which punitive damages were inflicted. According to the statement of the conductor, who seemed reluctant to remove Mrs. Brown from the train, it was suggested that if she would pay the fare, the conductor would telegraph his superintendent, and if it was ascertained that he misunderstood his duties, the money would be returned. This proposal was declined, under the impression, no doubt, that this stock pass to Mrs. Brown, however procured, and under whatever circumstances issued, would, if violated, furnish a cause of action against the company."

In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Collinsworth (1913) 152 Ky. 197, 153 S. W. 241, the plaintiff claimed the right to ride free on a freight train because he had a shipment of stock thereon, basing his claim on a custom which was his personal conclusion. It was shown to be a custom to allow the owner under some shipping contracts to accompany his stock, but plaintiff's bill of lading did not show that he had such right, and he was ejected from the train. It was held that there was no law giving a person the right to a pass on a freight train, and that in the absence of a custom, or provision in his contract, being alleged, a demurrer to his petition should have been sustained.

In Wallace v. Ann Arbor & Y. Electric R. Co. (1899) 121 Mich. 588, 80 N. W. 572, a suit to enforce an agreement for passes, it appeared that the defendant electric railway company had purchased two separate lines, over one of which plaintiff had a pass which the defendant did honor. It was held that the fact that the second line had for years, previous to the consolidation, honored plaintiff's pass, did not bind the defendant to do so.

In the reported case (MONTGOMERY LIGHT & TRACTION Co. v. AVANT, ante, 384) it was held that under a municipal ordinance requiring the free transportation of certain city employees and officials, including police officers when in uniform, that the badge of a city detective was his uniform as prescribed by the governing authority, and entitled him to free transportation.

Although the case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction by the United States Supreme Court, facts similar to those in the reported case are found in Public Utility Comrs. v. Manila Electric R. & Light Co. (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1918-19, 341) — U. S. —, 63 L. ed. —, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272, wherein it appeared that a franchise ordinance provided that members of the police and fire departments of the city of Manila shall be entitled to ride free upon the cars of the grantee of the franchise. The Board of Public Utility Commissioners deemed that members of the detective force not publicly wearing their badges were entitled to ride free under the provisions of the ordinance, and, after notice and hearing to the railroad on the subject, issued an order directing that members of the detective force be allowed to ride free under such circumstances. The railroad, challenging the validity of the order, refused to obey it, and, availing itself of the remedy provided by the local law, invoked the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the Philippine Islands, which decided that under the text of the ordinance the duty to furnish such transportation did not exist. The commissioners brought the case to the United States Supreme Court, which dismissed for want of jurisdiction. R. H. H.

APPEAL by the state from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County acquitting defendant of the charge of operating a motor vehicle without proper lights. Affirmed.

Statement by Preston, J.:

Defendant was informed against and accused of the crime of operating a motor vehicle without proper lights. He appealed to the district court. The trial court found defendant not guilty, and the state appeals.

Co. 97 Miss. 58, 51 So. 918, 53 So. 455, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1150.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information charges, substantially, that defendant operated upon the streets of Des Moines, at a time more than one hour after sunset, a motor vehicle, with a lighting device thereon of over 4 candle power, equipped with a reflector so arranged that the directly reflected and undiffused beam of light therefrom, when measured 75 feet ahead of the light, did not rise above 42 inches from the level surface on which the vehicle was standing and being operated, under all conditions of load.

The defendant made the following admission of record:

Mr. Bannister: This cause coming on for trial, the defendant admits that on the date and at the time and place in question he was operating an automobile in the city of Des Moines, Iowa, with the headlight lighted and so adjusted and arranged that the direct and undiffused beam or ray of light therefrom, when measured 75 feet ahead of the machine, was less than 42 inches above the ground on the level on which the machine was standing and being operated, and that the said headlight was of more than 4 candle power.

And upon said admission the state rested. The defendant introduced witnesses, who testified, substantially, to large experience in driving motor cars and in using headlights of different cars; that most headlights have been equipped with reflectors, so as to concentrate the light in one beam, so it will light up one spot, the light being in front of, or in, a concave reflector; where there is a plain glass in front of the light, the ray that comes from the light is called undiffused, or a direct beam; that, if the light is so arranged that it shoots up more than 42 inches from the ground, it will in nearly every case blind one who is approaching on the road, so he cannot see the road ahead; if this direct beam of light is down below 42 inches, it would not have as bad an effect on the driver approaching; if it is directed down, it strikes the ground and does not reflect in one's eyes; the centers of headlights on automobiles run 30 to 36 inches from the ground; there are prism lights made, which tend to diffuse the beams from a headlight; the larger portion of them, when properly installed, diffuse the light, so it is possible to drive against them without bothering one meeting them to any great extent; this is called a light that has a diffused ray, or a diffused beam. There are corrugated lights in a number of different forms, some colored and frosted, and a glass prism crosses the rays of light, or breaks them up, as some of the witnesses put it, and, as they cover a large area, rather than a direct beam in front of you, they will not extend or penetrate so far ahead, but do not reach one and blind him in meeting it. There are some lenses on the market made so that, when a light is deflected down so that it is only 42 inches from the ground 75 feet ahead of the machine, it will throw as far a light down the road as an undeflected beam. Quite a number of cars are equipped with dimmers; that is, two lights in the reflector, a small light and a large one. A headlight 16 to 40 candle power, with an ordinary reflector and globe, so arranged as to strike the road a long way ahead, if more than 42 inches above the ground, will practically blind a driver approaching. It is very annoying, and might be very dangerous.

One of the experts was asked:

Q. Now, what would you say, as a man of experience in the operating and handling of automobiles, of the effect of a statute which apparently required all automobile drivers to shoot a direct ray of light up above 42 inches from the ground?

A. I would think it would be very dangerous.

Q. In your opinion, would anyone who was drafting a statute for the purpose of benefiting the road laws, or making a proper adjustment and operation of automobile lights at night, make or enact such a provision into the law that the lights and direct rays of light should be shot up above 42 inches; would there be any object and reason for passing such a rule?

A. No, sir.

Q. State whether or not that is the very evil which is complained of.

A. It is.

Q. State whether or not that is the very evil which any remedial statute would be calculated to remedy.

A. I think so. More than 42 inches is calculated to strike the eyes of a driver approaching in a car; that is about the average height of a driver's eyes—3 feet, 6 inches.

Defendant introduced the original House File No. 131, as follows:

House File 131. A Bill for an Act to Amend Section Fifteen Hundred Seventy-one—m—Seventeen, Supplement to the Code 1913.

Section 1. That section fifteen hundred seventy-one—m—seventeen, Supplement to the Code 1913, be and the same is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end of said section, and substituting therefor the following:

"Provided, however, that it shall be unlawful for any person operating a motor vehicle upon the public highway in this state to use any lighting device of over four candle power, equipped with a reflector, unless the same shall be so designed, deflected or arranged that (no part of the beam of the reflected) light, when measured seventy-five (75) feet or more ahead of the light shall rise above forty-two (42) inches from the level surface on which the vehicle stands under all conditions of load."

Also the senate amendment thereto, as follows: "I move to amend H. F. No. 131, by striking out all after the word 'that' in line eleven, down to and including the word 'reflected' in said line of section one, and inserting the words 'the directly reflected and undiffused beam of such.'"

The statute as it stands, and for a violation of which the defendant is accused, reads:

"That section fifteen hundred seventy-one—m—seventeen, Supplement to the Code 1913, be and the same is hereby amended by striking out the period (.) at the end of said section, and substituting therefor the following:

"Provided, however, that it shall be unlawful for any person operating a motor vehicle upon the public highway in this state to use any lighting device of over four candle power, equipped with a reflector, unless the same shall be so designed, deflected or arranged that the directly reflected and undiffused beam of such light, when measured seventy-five feet or more ahead of the light shall rise above forty-two inches from the level surface on which the vehicle stands under all conditions of load. Spot lights shall not be used so as to throw direct rays in the face of an approaching vehicle.'" Acts 37th Gen. Assem. chap. 148.

The trial court construed this statute so as to read into it the word "not," so as to read "the light shall not rise above forty-two inches," etc.

It is contended by the state that it is not admissible to speculate on what a statute might mean beyond the import of the words used, citing Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. 58, 92, 7 L. ed. 347, 359, from which they quote this: "What the legislative intention was can be derived only from the words they have used; and we cannot speculate beyond the reasonable import of these words. The spirit of the act must be extracted from the words of the act, and not from conjectures aliunde."

They say, too, that the justice and policy of statutes enacted by the legislative department of the government are not matters for the consideration of the courts of the state. Burlington C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey, 82 Iowa, 312, 344, 12 L.R.A. 436, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 584, 31 Am. St. Rep. 477, 48 N. W. 107, from which they quote as follows: "Much is said in argument attacking the justice and policy of the statutes. With these things we have nothing to do. They are for the consideration of the legislative department of the government alone."

Also Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Finn, 117 C. C. A. 1, 4, 195 Fed. 685, 688, from which they quote: "It is not for the court to inquire or determine whether a state of facts existed calling for the enactment of the legislation in question. That is for the exclusive consideration of the legislature. If, under any possible state of facts, the act would be constitutional and valid, the court is bound to presume that such condition existed."

The state says that the literal construction of a statute may defeat the objects of the act, and quotes from another case that it is better to abide by this consequence than to put upon it a construction not warranted by the words of an act, in order to give effect to what we suppose to have been the intention of the legislature. The argument is that the language of the statute is perfectly plain; that it declares certain acts to be a public offense and as criminal in character; that the rule is that such statutes should be strictly construed, and not to change the wording by adding to or taking from. They say, too, that in construing a statute the rule is that it is necessary to consider the context or setting, and the presumption is that the words should be given their usual and ordinary meaning and significance. They concede that the object of all interpretation and construction of a statute is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the legislature, and that it is only when the act is of doubtful or ambiguous meaning that the province of a construction or interpretation begins, because it is a maxim of interpretation that it is not permitted to interpret what has no need of interpretation.

These rules are not disputed by appellee, but they rely on other principles as well. It is argued by appellee that the legislature intended to correct the abuse in the use of blinding headlights on automobiles on the public highway, and that defendant was using a proper light, and was complying with the spirit and intent of the statute, and further that there is a clerical error in the statute which the court can correct. Numerous cases are cited, but we shall not discuss them all, but state their propositions. They cite McBride v. McBride, 142 Iowa, 169, 179, 120 N. W. 709; Cherokee v. Illinois C. R. Co. 157 Iowa, 73, 137 N. W. 1053; Engvall v. Des Moines City R. Co. 145 Iowa, 560, 121 N. W. 12; and Flam v. Lee, 116 Iowa, 289, 93 Am. St. Rep. 242, 90 N. W. 70, to the point that, in construing instructions to juries, where they are manifestly wrong and state the opposite of that intended, but the error could mislead no one as to what was intended, they are not held to be erroneous. They cite United States v. 99 Diamonds, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, 72 C. C. A. 9, 139 Fed. 961, and Com. v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 4 Ann. Cas. 209, to the proposition that the object which the legislature sought to obtain by a statute, and the evil which it endeavored to remedy, may always be considered to ascertain its intent and interpret its act. Other cases are cited to the proposition that statutes must be so construed as to give effect to the evident legislative intent, though the result seems contrary to rules of construction and the strict letter of the statute, and that surrounding circumstances and the ends intended to be accomplished should be considered. Voelker v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (C. C.) 116 Fed. 867; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Voelker, 70 L.R.A. 264, 65 C. C. A. 226, 129 Fed. 522, is cited to sustain the proposition that statutes, the principle of which is to protect the lives and limbs of men, are so construed as to prevent the mischief and advance the remedy, so far as the words fairly permit. They concede that the context should be considered in interpreting a statute.

White v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 25 Utah, 346, 71 Pac. 593, 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 260; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 19, 20; and Comfort v. Kittle, 81 Iowa, 179, 46 N. W. 988, are cited on the proposition that it is a rule of statutory construction that where one word has been erroneously used for another, or a word omitted, and the context affords the means of correction, the proper word will be deemed substituted or supplied. In the case of Lancaster County v. Frey, 128 Pa. 593, 18 Atl. 478, the word "county" was inserted in a statute for "city." In Graham v. Charlotte & S. C. R. Co. 64 N. C. 631, the word "venire," in a statute relating to actions against railroads, was construed to mean "venue." In Moody v. Stephenson, 1 Minn. 401, Gil. 289, all "penal" judgments were construed to mean all "final" judgments. In Palms v. Shawano County, 61 Wis. 211, 21 N. W. 77, the word "north" was read into a description in a statute instead of "south." In Frazier v. Gibson, 7 Mo. 271, where a statute provided that an obligor or maker of a note should be allowed every just set-off and discount against the assignee or assignor before "judgment," it was held that the word "judgment" was evidently inserted by mistake. See Hutchings v. Commercial Bank, 91 Va. 68, 20 S. E. 950; Ashby v. State, 124 Tenn. 684, 139 S. W. 872. In State v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 97 Miss. 35, 51 So. 918, 53 So. 455, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1150, where it appeared that a statute would fail to effectuate the purpose intended, or any purpose, and that it had been omitted by mistake, the word "not" was construed into the statute.

Appellant does not contradict these propositions, except in so far as the cases heretofore cited by them do so. The trial court, in an opinion filed, conceded that courts could not amend a statute, as they have no power to do so, but that reading into the statute the word "not" carries out and gives it an application intended by the legislature, and conceded, too, that great caution should be exercised by the courts in construing statutes, not to add to or take anything from the language used. The decision of the trial court was based on the citation from Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr.; Frazier v. Gibson; Lancaster County v. Frey; and Hutchings v. Commercial Bank,—supra. But these cases, and some of the others cited, perhaps all of them, proceed upon the idea that, where the context of the statute affords the means of correction, it may be done.

Under the authorities, it is proper for us to take into consideration the object which the legislature sought to obtain and the evil which it endeavored to remedy, and the surrounding circumstances and the ends intended to be accomplished, as well as the context, and that statutes should be so construed as to give effect to the evident legislative intent. We may take into consideration the fact that automobiles are in common use, and that certain lights used on automobiles oftentimes blind the driver of a vehicle approaching in the opposite direction, and that the purpose of the legislature in passing the act in question was to correct this condition.

We are satisfied, from all these circumstances and the record, that it was not the intention of the legislature to pass the act as it reads. Conceding this to be so, the question is: May we, under the circumstances and record, read into the statute a word which gives it exactly the opposite effect. We are not disposed to go that far. It seems to us, to do so we would be compelled to take into consideration matters not proper for us to consider, such as the evidence or opinions of witnesses testifying in this case, and the like.

Evidence—
opinions—commendation of statute.

We could construe it as written, but, as said, we are satisfied such was not the intention. In this case the word "not" was read into the statute in order to work the acquittal of the accused. Nevertheless, it is a criminal statute. Might this be done in order to secure a conviction, if it were necessary to do so?

We reach the conclusion that, rather than to construe the statute as written, or to read into it the word "not" as was done by the trial court, we ought to and do hold that as to this particular point there was a failure of legislation, and that the defendant was properly discharged on that ground; there being no statute under which he could be convicted of the charge against him. The legislature is about to meet, and if the matter is brought to their attention they can readily make the matter plain.

CITY OF SANTA FE.

New Mexico Supreme Court—December 30, 1918.

Statute — construction — supplying words.

1. Where it appears from the context of an act or ordinance that words have been omitted therefrom, the same may be supplied by judicial construction, to complete the sense and express the legislative will. If no judicial certainty, however, can be settled upon as to its meaning, after resorting to every authorized means of construction, the court will not complete or make certain an act or ordinance otherwise incomplete and uncertain.

— purpose of preamble.

2. A preamble is a prefatory statement or explanation or a finding of facts by the power making it, purporting to state the purpose, reason, or occasion for making the law to which it is prefixed. Although not an essential part of an act or ordinance, reference thereto may be had in aid of the interpretation of the act or ordinance of which it is a part.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — construction.

3. Municipal ordinances are construed by the same rules as statutes of the legislature.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Santa Fe County dismissing the complaint in a suit to enjoin the enforcement or attempted enforcement of a certain ordinance, under which the defendant city claimed the right to compel plaintiff to discontinue the storage of petroleum and its products in said city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Frank J. Lavan and Catron & Catron, for appellant:

The court erred in sustaining defendant's demurrer to that portion of plaintiff's complaint which set up a contract based upon the franchise of September 5, 1904.

The ordinance in question was unconscionable, oppressive, arbitrary, unreasonable, and unjust, and such an unwarranted and unfair assumption of authority as to constitute an abuse of the same, amounting to confiscation, and was void as being in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Messrs. J. J. Kenney, E. P. Davies, and N. D. Meyer for appellee.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the Continental Oil Company from a judgment rendered in the district court of Santa Fe county, dismissing a complaint filed by it against the city of Santa Fe.

The suit was instituted by the appellant for the purpose of enjoining and restraining the enforcement, or attempted enforcement, of a certain ordinance of said city under which the latter claimed the right to compel the appellant and others to discontinue the storage of petroleum and its products in said city.

The appellant is now, and for many years last past has been, engaged in the business of storing, distributing, and selling petroleum and its products in said city, and in prosecuting its business in those respects it has maintained and used warehouses, tanks, and other instrumentalities within said city. In pursuance of a contract made in 1904 between the appellant and the city, the former, upon premises owned by it adjacent to a line of railway in said city, erected a warehouse constructed of brick, with stone foundation and metal roof and doors, at a cost to it of about $2,500. There is also situate upon said property three metal tanks, of the total capacity of 18,000 gallons, which are used in the prosecution of its said business.

On January 3, 1917, the appellee ordained the following ordinance (the marginal numerals being inserted by us for convenience):

An Ordinance Regulating the Handling, Storage, etc., of Petroleum, Gasolene, etc., in the City of Santa Fe.

Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Santa Fe:

That whereas, the use and maintenance of storage warehouses and depots for the storage, selling, handling, and distributing of petroleum or kerosene (commonly called (1) coal oil), gasolene, and any and all kinds of oil used for fuel, power, or illuminating purposes, inside of the city limits of the city of Santa Fe, is highly dangerous to the lives and property of the citizens of the city of Santa Fe, and constitutes a nuisance:

3 A.L.R.—26.

Therefore it is hereby ordained:

That any person, firm, company, or corporation who shall so keep,

(2) use, conduct, or maintain a warehouse or warehouses, storage depot, or place inside of the city limits of the city of Santa Fe, wherein petroleum or kerosene (commonly called coal oil), gasolene, or any other kind of oil, used for or suitable for fuel, power, or illuminating purposes, in quantities of more than one barrel, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $25 nor more than $50, or imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than thirty days, and for the purpose of this ordinance (each day) that said warehouses, storage depots, or places where (3) such oils, in quantities of more than one barrel, are kept, shall constitute a separate offense.

The Continental Oil Company, and any other persons, firms, companies, and corporations, so

(4) running, operating, maintaining, or conducting such warehouses, storage depots, or places where such petroleum or kerosene, gasolene, and other kinds of oil used for fuel, power, or illuminating purposes, within the city limits of said city of Santa Fe, in quantities exceeding one barrel, are hereby ordered and required to remove its or their said warehouses, storage depots, or places beyond the city limits of the city of Santa Fe within ten days from the service upon it or them of a copy of this ordinance.

Counsel for appellant, appellee, and the amicus curiæ have filed able and exhaustive briefs in this cause. Many of the propositions presented involve matters of great importance and without precedent in this jurisdiction. For instance, the following, among other propositions, are presented: That the contract of 1904 was a measure for the regulation of the business of the appellant, and did not constitute bartering away the police power of the city; that the city was without power to summarily declare the business of the appellant a nuisance, and its declaration to that extent does not constitute an adjudication of the fact; that courts may review the reasonableness of ordinances of a municipality passed under the police power, and declare them void because of the nature of their provisions; and that the ordinance is not general in its nature and impartial in its operation. Not only are these specific propositions raised, but the case involves a discussion of many of the ramifications of each of these questions. We are also asked to comprehensively define, in particular respect to the parties affected, the limits beyond which a municipality may not go in the pretended exercise of the so-called police power. Each and every one of these propositions ought to be determined in this jurisdiction for the future guidance of the officers of the municipalities of this state; but a discussion of them would necessarily be premised upon the assumption that some definite and ascertained meaning may be and is attached to the ordinance involved herein, whereas, as we shall hereafter demonstrate, the ordinance is indefinite and unintelligible. So uncertain are its terms that no fixed meaning can be ascribed thereto. Consequently we cannot determine many of the propositions submitted, but are constrained to determine the appeal upon purely formal matters, viz., matters pertinent to the construction of the ordinance.

The title of the ordinance purports to advise that the ordinance was to regulate the handling, storage, etc., of petroleum, gasoline, etc. The main subject of the title is petroleum, etc., not warehouses.

(1) The matter opposite marginal numeral 1, the same being ¶ 1 of the ordinance, is introductory to, and explanatory of, the reasons for passing the ordinance, and constitutes the preamble, a wholly unnecessary part of an ordinance. Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 37 L.R.A. 294, 300, 62 Am.

Statute—purpose of preamble.

St. Rep. 477, 47 N. E. 19; Fenner v. Luzerne County, 167 Pa. 632, 31 Atl. 862; Coverdale v. Edwards, 155 Ind. 374, 58 N. E. 495; Den ex dem. Lloyd v. Urison, 2 N. J. L. 212; *Den ex dem. In the latter case it was said that a preamble is a prefatory statement or explanation or a finding of facts by the power making it, purporting to state the purpose, reason, or occasion for making the law to which it is prefixed.

It is utilized as an aid to the interpretation of the act to which it is prefixed, for the purpose of clarifying, or to assist in clarifying, ambiguities. Its office is to expound powers conferred, not substantially to create them. 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Const. 2d ed. § 341. The subject is fully discussed in the last-mentioned work. The ordinance in question not being ambiguous, but so uncertain as to fail to prescribe a rule of conduct, the preamble performs no important function herein.

The matter opposite marginal numeral 2, being the second paragraph of the ordinance, is incomplete and inconclusive in expression, and fails to prescribe a rule of conduct. The expression of the thought, purpose, and object of the ordinance is omitted therein. The first part of the paragraph, omitting superfluous words, is to be read substantially as follows: Any person who shall keep a place in said city where petroleum, in quantities of more than one barrel (?), shall be fined or imprisoned.

In the words of counsel for appellant: "What? What about the petroleum, etc., in quantities of more than one barrel? Are manufactured? Are refined? Are distilled?"

Certainly the paragraph remains in an unfinished state, and, lacking a predicate, no rule of conduct is thereby prescribed, and consequently the sense of the paragraph is left wholly to speculation. The entire ordinance is so inconsistently phrased that we can only conjecture as to what the power ordaining it intended to accomplish thereby.

—construction—supplying words.

The matter opposite marginal numeral 3, being the latter part of ¶ 2 of the ordinance, is radically imperfect. It is not an imperfection which may be cured by judicially inserting, by construction, words plainly omitted by reference to the context, but represents an unintelligible sentence. Reference to it (quoted above) will disclose that it is to be read thus, when superfluous matter is eliminated therefrom: Each day that said places, shall constitute a separate offense.

Obviously the sentence is incomplete, and what was intended by the power ordaining it is, again, a matter of pure speculation. These are not nice and refined observations upon diction or phraseology, but substantial errors in the preparation and ordaining of the ordinance.

The matter opposite marginal numeral 4 is akin to that opposite marginal numeral 2, in that it was evidently patterned upon it, and fails to contain a predicate to the subject of the topic sentence.

(2) In the exercise of their function of interpreting and construing acts of the legislative branch of the government, courts, in the exercise of common sense and judgment, will not permit an act to be declared invalid for uncertainty or vagueness where reason demands that words be inserted therein. This rule is founded upon the premise, however, that the intent of the lawmaking power is so expressed in the act involved that from its context the meaning thereof is ascertainable. The rule is well stated in 36 Cyc. 1127, as follows: "Where it appears from the context that certain words have been inadvertently omitted from a statute, the court may supply such words as are necessary to complete the sense and to express the legislative intent. But in the application of this rule the court should exercise great care to keep within its province of construction, and not to trespass upon that of legislation."

The rule is also referred to at page 1113 in the same volume and work, where it is said: "Where a statute is incomplete or defective, whether as a result of inadvertence or because the case in question was not foreseen or contemplated, it is beyond the province of the courts to supply the omissions, even though as a result the statute is a nullity."

In 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d. ed. it is said:

"Legislative enactments are not, any more than any other writings, to be defeated on account of mistakes, errors, or omissions, provided the intention of the legislature can be collected from the whole statute, and the title and preamble may be referred to for this purpose." § 410.

"To enable the court to insert in a statute omitted words or read it in different words from those found in it, the intent thus to have it read must be plainly deducible from other parts of the statute. When the descriptive words constitute the very essence of the act, unless the description is so clear and accurate as to refer to the particular subject intended, and be incapable of being applied to any other, the mistake is fatal." § 411.

In the discussion of this proposition the doctrine is also mentioned that to constitute an enforceable act the statute or ordinance must prescribe a rule of action, and unless it does do so it is void for uncertainty. A case where the court says all that may be necessary to say concerning the matter is that of State ex rel. Crow v. West Side Street R. Co. 146 Mo. 155, 47 S. W. 959, where it is said: "Recurring to the point first suggested, this question is presented: Does the act sufficiently express the legislative will to enable the courts and officers charged with its execution to ascertain and enforce it? A statute cannot be held void for uncertainty if any reasonable and practical construction can be given to its language. Mere difficulty in ascertaining its meaning, or the fact that it is susceptible of different interpretations, will not render it nugatory. Doubts as to its proper construction will not justify us in disregarding it. It is the bounden duty of the courts to endeavor, by every rule of construction, to ascertain the meaning of, and to give full force and effect to, every enactment of the general assembly not obnoxious to constitutional prohibitions. It is equally true that a mere collection of words cannot constitute a law; otherwise, the dictionary can be transformed into a statute by the proper legislative formula. An act of the legislature, to be enforceable as a law, must prescribe a rule of action, and such rule must be intelligibly expressed. 'It is plainly the duty of the court to construe a statute ambiguous in its meaning so as to give effect to the legislative intent, if this be practicable. . . . But a statute must be capable of construction and interpretation; otherwise it will be inoperative and void. The court must use every authorized means to ascertain and give it an intelligible meaning; but if, after such effort, it is found to be impossible to solve the doubt and dissolve the obscurity, if no judicial certainty can be settled upon as to the meaning, the court is not at liberty to supply or make one. The court may not allow "conjectural interpretation to usurp the place of judicial exposition." There must be a competent and efficient expression of the legislative will' [citing cases]. . . . It is needless to cite authorities to show that which is self-evident. It is manifest that an act of the legislative department cannot be enforced when its meaning cannot be determined by any known rules of construction. The courts cannot venture upon the dangerous path of judicial legislation to supply omissions or remedy defects in matters committed to a co-ordinate branch of the government. It is far better to wait for necessary corrections by those authorized to make them, or, in fact, for them to remain unmade, however desirable they may be, than for judicial tribunals to transcend the just limits of their constitutional powers."

(3) Municipal ordinances are construed by the same rules as statutes of the legislature. 28 Cyc. 388.

The application of the foregoing rules manifestly makes it necessary to hold that the ordinance in question is so vague and uncertain that it fails to prescribe a rule of action. We may only surmise what the power ordaining the ordinance intended. The ordinance, as it stands, is wholly inoperative, and, if it is to be corrected, the power that ordained it must make the correction. We are not justified in completing the ordinance under the guise of judicial construction. For the reasons stated, the judgment of the trial court will be reversed, with instructions to enter judgment granting the relief prayed for in the complaint; and it is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Supplying omitted words in statute or ordinance.

- I. General rule, 404.
- II. Application of rule, 405.
- III. Exceptions to rule, 410.

I. General rule.

Where words have been omitted from a statute or an ordinance by in-advertence or through a clerical error, and the intent of the legislature is ascertainable from the context, the court will insert the words necessary to carry out that intent. Courts will not permit an act to be declared invalid for uncertainty, where reason demands the insertion of words therein.

II. Application of rule.

In Morris v. People (1893) 4 Colo. App. 136, 35 Pac. 188, a statute was construed which penalized any person who should, by false representations, “obtain a credit thereby defraud any person.” It was held that the word “and” should be supplied before the word “thereby,” the court saying: “An insignificant alteration in the phraseology, or the omission of a word of this description in the adoption of a statute of another state, or in the revision of a statute, does not necessarily imply an intention to alter the construction of the act. It is equally settled that wherever there is an apparent mistake on the face of a statute the character of the error may often be determined by reference to other parts of the enactment, which may always be legitimately referred to in order to determine its legitimate construction.”

In Brinsfield v. Carter (1847) 2 Ga. 143, the act which was before the court for construction related to the granting of state lands to persons who complied with the provisions of the act. The word “grant” was omitted from the third section of the act, which read as follows: “That from and after the said 1st day of October, 1844, any person, a citizen of this state, by paying into the treasury the sum of two thousand dollars, shall be entitled to receive from this state in his, her or their name, to any ungranted lot of land in the counties aforesaid." The fourth section provided that where two or more persons applied for the same lot at the same time, the surveyor general should place the names of the applicants in a hat, and the first name drawn should be entitled to the grant. It was held that the grant referred to in the fourth section of the act was the grant contemplated by the third section, and that the word "grant" in the third section had been omitted by a clerical error, and would be supplied by the court in order to give effect to the statute.

In Abernathy v. Mitchell (1901) 113 Ga. 127, 38 S. E. 303, there was involved an act amending a section of the Civil Code relative to affidavits in forma pauperis in the courts of ordinary. The title of the act stated its purpose to be to make certain specific changes. In addition to these the words, "or proceeding in the court of ordinary," were omitted, making the act applicable to all courts. It was held that the omission was inadvertent, and that the words quoted would be supplied by the court.

In Loverin v. McLaughlin (1896) 161 Ill. 417, 44 N. E. 99, a statute involving the liability of directors of a defectively or illegally organized corporation was construed. It appeared that § 4 of the act (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 32), directed the secretary of state to issue a certificate of the complete organization of the corporation, making a part thereof a copy of all papers in and about the organization of the corporation, authenticated under his hand and the seal of the state, and provided further as follows: "The same shall be recorded in a book for that purpose in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county where the principal office of such company is located. Upon the recording of said copy, the corporation shall be deemed fully organized, and may proceed to business." It was held that although, from a literal reading of the statute, it would appear that only a copy of all papers filed in the office of the secretary of state was demanded, it was also the evident intention to require the recording of the certificate of the secretary of state, of which such copy was a part. The court held this to be the evident intent of the legislature from the fact that the preceding part of the section required that "the same shall be recorded," and the words, "the same," referred back to the certificate and the copy, the copy being part of the certificate; and as "a copy of all papers," etc., was made a part of the certificate, and the latter was "duly authenticated under his hand and seal," the certificate and the copy attached to it constituted one document. It was accordingly held that the words, "upon the recording of said copy," were to be understood as if the words, "certificate and," had been inserted.

In George M. Clark & Co. v. Kent (1899) 80 Ill. App. 128, following Loverin v. McLaughlin (1896) 161 Ill. 417, 44 N. E. 99, the word "or" was written into § 18 of the Corporation Act, as follows: "If any person or persons being, or pretending to be, an officer or agent, or board of directors, of any stock corporation, or pretended stock corporation, shall assume to exercise corporate powers, or use the name of any such corporation, or pretended corporation, without complying with the provisions of this act, (or) before all stock named in the articles of incorporation shall be subscribed in good faith, then they shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts and liabilities made by them, and contracted in the name of such corporation, or pretended corporation."

In Gustavel v. State (1899) 153 Ind. 613, 54 N. E. 123, it appeared that a statute regulating fishing in one section prohibited the taking of fish in any of the "streams" of the state, while the next section allowed fishing with a hook and line during certain months of the year in any "waters" of the state. It was held that the legislature intended to distinguish between "streams" and "waters," and therefore that the word "other" should be inserted before "waters." The court said: "The intent of the act is evident and it should be carried into effect. Criminal statutes should not be construed so strictly as to defeat their obvious interpretations. The principle of strict construction does not allow a court to make that an offense which is not such by legislative enactment, but this does not exclude the application of common sense to the terms made use of in an act, in order to avoid an absurdity which the legislature ought not to be presumed to have intended."

In Landrum v. Flannigan (1899) 60 Kan. 436, 56 Pac. 753, it appeared that a statute gave a right of action to certain persons injured by reason of the intoxication of another. After stating who these persons were, it enumerated them again in the same sentence, but omitted from those previously named, "employers" and "other persons." It was held that these words were omitted by mistake, and should be inserted.

In State v. Taylor (1913) 90 Kan. 438, 133 Pac. 861, there was involved a statute providing as follows: "Any mortgagor of personal property or any other person who shall injure, destroy or conceal any mortgaged property, or any part thereof, with intent to defraud the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, personal representatives or assigns, or shall sell or dispose of the same without the written consent of the mortgagee or his executors, administrators, personal representatives or assigns, shall be deemed guilty of larceny." "For selling, injuring, destroying, concealing or disposing of such property of the value of twenty dollars and under, on which the mortgagee has a lien, or of the value of over twenty dollars, on which the mortgagee has a lien of not more than twenty dollars, such person shall be deemed guilty of petit larceny, and on conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or by both such fine and imprisonment; for selling, injuring, destroying, concealing or disposing of such property of the value of twenty dollars and over, on which the mortgagee has a lien to the amount of twenty dollars, such person shall be deemed guilty of grand larceny and on conviction shall be punished by confinement and hard labor not exceeding five years (Laws 1911, chap. 226, § 1)." The statute, as it read, made the same act both a felony and a misdemeanor, and made no provision for cases in which the property involved was worth over twenty dollars, and was subjected to a lien of over twenty dollars. The statute was based on § 1 of chapter 105 of the Laws of 1901, which contained the words, "the amount of over twenty dollars;" but the word "over" was omitted by a typographical error when the act was republished in the General Statutes of 1901, and the General Statutes of 1909 followed the General Statutes of 1901, and also left the word out. In 1911, in amending the law in another particular, the new act was drafted from the compilation of 1909, but was copied from the reprint instead of the official publication, and so the word "over" was again omitted. It was held that under these circumstances there could be no doubt that the statute should be construed as though it contained the missing word.

In Com. v. Barney (1903) 115 Ky. 475, 74 S. W. 181, it appeared that the title of an act, making it an offense to dispose of the property of another, contained the word "fraudulently," but that this word was used nowhere else in the act. It was contended that therefore the act violated that section of the Constitution which provides that a bill or act must not contain more than one subject, which must be expressed in the title. It was held that the act must be construed in such a way as to be constitutional, if that could be done without doing violence to the manifest legislative intent. It was therefore held that the legislature intended to include in the acts prohibited only those that were intentionally fraudulent. The court thus inserted the word "fraudulently" in the statute, to carry out the legislative intent.

In Com. v. Herald Pub. Co. (1908) 128 Ky. 424, 108 S. W. 892, 16 Ann. Cas. 761, there was involved a statute (Ky. Stat. 1903, § 1352) providing as follows: "Any person or corporation who sells . . . any obscene, lewd, lascivious, filthy, indecent or disgusting book, magazine, pamphlet, newspaper, . . . or who writes, prints, publishes, or utters . . . any advertisement or notice of any kind, giving information . . . where, how, of whom, or by what means any, or what purports to be any, obscene, lewd, filthy, indecent or disgusting book, picture, writing, paper . . . named in this section can be purchased, obtained or had." The section did not declare the acts specified therein to be unlawful, nor did it state that a person who did the acts therein named should be guilty of any offense. It was held that as the intent of the section was clear and the purpose of its enactment plain, it would not be allowed to fail by reason of the omission of the words, "it shall be unlawful for," which should have been placed at the beginning of the section, and of the words, "shall be guilty of an offense," which should have been added to the section.

In Com. v. Stahr (1915) 162 Ky. 388, 172 S. W. 677, it appeared that the grand jury had indicted the fiscal court of the city of Fulton for maintaining a public nuisance, by permitting a public road, known as the State Line road, to become and remain in an impassable and dangerous condition. The defense was that the road lay within the corporate limits of the city of Fulton, and therefore was not under the jurisdiction of the fiscal court. It appeared that the boundary line between Tennessee and Kentucky was along the south curb of State street. The street was therefore wholly within the state of Kentucky, and as its condition was admitted, the only question was whether it was a city street or a public road of the county. The charter of the city of Fulton was put in evidence, defining the city boundary, and showed that the southern boundary began at the southwest corner of the Carr Institute lot and extended thence in a northwardly and northeastwardly direction until it was carried to a stake on the brow of the hill west of the bridge on said State Line road; "thence with said State Line road to the beginning." The place of beginning was described as being located "on the state line at the southwest corner of Carr Institute lot." It was claimed that the word "road" was omitted by mistake and should be inserted after the words "state line," thus making the boundary begin "on the State Line road at the southwest corner of Carr Institute lot," so as to conform to the subsequent description as above given. It was held that the word "road" should be inserted, in order to give effect to the obvious intention of the legislature.

In Waters v. Laurel (1901) 93 Md. 221, 48 Atl. 499, it appeared that one section of a statute, authorizing the mayor and city council of the town of Laurel to issue bonds for constructing a waterworks, omitted the words, "of Laurel," although the words were contained in the title and in the other sections of the act. It was held that these words could be inserted, as it was clear that that was the intent of the legislature, as gathered from the title and from the other parts of the act.

In Loper v. State (1900) 82 Minn. 71, 84 N. W. 650, wherein it appeared that a law providing a bounty for the arrest and conviction of horse thieves had been erroneously copied, and the act as it read provided a bounty for the conviction of every criminal offense, it was held that as the intent and purpose of the act could be clearly understood from its title, which contained the words, "for the arrest and conviction of horse thieves," these words must be read into the act for the purpose of giving it its true meaning, and to interpret correctly the purpose of the legislature in passing the act. The court said: "Legislative enactments are not to be defeated on account of mistakes, errors, or omissions, provided the intention of the legislature can be collected from the whole statute, and the title and its history may be referred to for that purpose."

In Earhart v. State (1889) 67 Miss. 325, 7 So. 347, it appeared that in amending a statute (Code 1880, § 2958) relating to the carrying of concealed weapons, the clause, "or having good and sufficient reason to apprehend an attack," was stricken out. The section as thus amended contained the meaningless phrase, "not being threatened with." It was held that as it was evident that the legislature did not intend to nullify the law, but only to amend it, the words, "an attack," should be retained so that the section as amended would read, "any person not being threatened with an attack . . . who carried concealed," etc.

In State ex rel. Bartlett v. Brodigan (1914) 37 Nev. 245, 141 Pac. 988, a statute relating to the redistricting of the judicial districts of the state was construed. The first section divided the state into ten judicial districts and described their boundaries. It then provided for the number of judges as follows: "For each of said districts judges shall be elected by the qualified electors thereof at the general election in 1914 and every four years thereafter, except as otherwise provided in this act as follows: For each of said districts except the second judicial district, there shall be [elected one judge. For the second judicial district there shall be] two judges elected." The words in brackets were omitted from the enrolled bill, as signed by the governor. Section 3 provided for the salaries to be paid to the judges. Section 4 provided that the second judicial district should have two judges, and made provision for their jurisdiction, giving them concurrent and co-extensive powers. There was, therefore, a conflict between § 1 and § 4 of the act. Section 1 provided that the second judicial district should have only one judge, while § 4 provided for two judges. In § 3 the judges in each district were referred to in the singular number, and their jurisdiction was not provided for specially, as was done by § 4 for the second judicial district. It was held that the words in brackets were omitted by mistake.

In Jones v. Mail & Exp. Pub. Co. (1894) 80 Hun, 368, 30 N. Y. Supp. 335, the court held that a statute which provided for the filing of the certificate of the payment of the capital stock of a corporation "in the office of the secretary of state, and of the county in which the principal business office of the corporation is situated," must be construed to read so as to designate the office of the clerk of the county as one of the places where the certificate should be filed, as that was the evident intent of the legislature, there being no other place in counties throughout the state where papers can be legally recorded and filed.

In Worth v. Peck (1847) 7 Pa. 268, it was held that, where a statute provided a penalty of "not less than one nor more than three hundred dollars," the minimum penalty was $100 and not $1.

In Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. (1883) 102 Pa. 190, it was held that the word "annually" must be read into a statute which provided that a railroad company should pay 6 per cent of all dividends exceeding 6 per cent of its capital stock to the city of Philadelphia. The court said this was necessary in order to prevent the purpose of the act from being rendered of no effect; for the directors of the corporation could defeat the act by declaring a dividend as often as necessary to prevent it being large enough to be taxable.

In State ex rel. Dolan v. Clarksville & R. Turnp. Co. (1854) 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 88, it was held that in a statute which gave a turnpike company the right to erect a tollgate "within 2 miles of Clarksville," the words, "but not nearer," must be inserted to give effect to the intent of the legislature in granting the charter.

In Wright v. Cunningham (1905) 115 Tenn. 445, 91 S. W. 293, the law under consideration read as follows: "The ticket shall provide for those favoring the Small Stock Law, 'for the Small Stock Law' and those 'against said law.'" The court held that there was an omission of the word "for" between "and" and "those," and after the word "those" an omission of the expression, "opposing the Small Stock Law," so that, as corrected, the sentence read: "The ticket shall provide for those favoring the Small Stock Law, 'for the Small Stock Law,' and for those opposing the Small Stock Law, 'against the Small Stock Law.'"

In Ashby v. State (1911) 124 Tenn. 684, 139 S. W. 872, the statute involved read as follows: "An act to create a board of jury commissioners for counties in this state having a population of 19,100 and less than 19,000 inhabitants of the Federal census of 1900 or that may have that number of inhabitants by any subsequent Federal census, and for the election of juries; to prescribe the duties of the members of said board and of the judges, and punish violations of this act; to provide for jury lists and jury boxes to be kept in each county affected by this act; and to repeal all laws in conflict with this act." The act as it read was without sense, and the court, to carry out the legislative intent, inserted the words, "not more than," immediately before the figures "19,100" and the word "not" immediately before the word "less."

In State v. Crockett (1917) 137 Tenn. 679, 195 S. W. 583, it was held that in a statute relating to the obtaining of money by means of worthless checks, drafts, or orders the words, "shall be made," should be inserted to make that part of the statute read sensibly, so that it read: "Unless payment shall be made of such check, draft or order after giving seven days' written notice mailed to the drawer's last known address."

In Hutchings v. Commercial Bank (1895) 91 Va. 68, 20 S. E. 950, the Married Woman's Law (Acts 1877-78, p. 248) was before the court. The second paragraph of this act provided that a married woman should have the same right to devise and bequeath her property as if unmarried, and then read as follows: "And provided further, that the sole and separate estate created by any gift, grant, devise or bequest shall be held according to the terms and powers, and be subject to the provisions and limitations thereof, and to the provisions and limitations of this act, so far as they are in conflict therewith." The act was conflicting in its terms, for in the sentence quoted it upheld and preserved separate estates, and yet in the last words quoted it would appear that they were made subject to the provisions of the act. It appeared that the word "not" was included in the Act of April 4, 1877, in the enrolled bill, so that the act read "so far as they are not in conflict therewith," but this word was omitted both in the enrolled bill and the printed acts when the act was amended and re-enacted by the Act of March 14, 1878. It was held that the word had been omitted by inadvertence, and should be inserted to give an intelligent effect to the statute, and to carry out the manifest intent of the legislature.

In Nichols v. Halliday (1871) 27 Wis. 406, the court construed a statute providing as follows: "The keeper of a boarding house shall have the same lien upon and right to detain the baggage and effects of any boarder for the amount which may be due for board by such boarder, to the same extent and in the same manner as innkeepers have such lien and such right of detention." It was held that the words, "with respect to the baggage and effects of their guests," must be supplied at the end of this section, as the sentence was elliptical and the words were plainly suggested by the context.

III. Exceptions to rule.

A court will not insert words in a statute or ordinance which is so vague and uncertain as to have no definite meaning, or the meaning of which can be ascertained only by conjecture, but will declare the act to be inoperative and void. Holmberg v. Jones (1901) 7 Idaho, 752, 65 Pac. 563; STATE v. CLAIBORNE (reported herewith) ante, 392; CONTINENTAL OIL CO. v. SANTA FE (reported herewith) ante, 398; Kennahan v. New York (1914) 162 App. Div. 364, 147 N. Y. Supp. 835.

In Holmberg v. Jones (1901) 7 Idaho, 752, 65 Pac. 563, an act entitled, "An Act to Create and Organize the County of Clearwater and Define the Boundaries of Shoshone, Idaho and Nez Perces Counties," was under the consideration of the court. It appeared that the language of the act was conflicting, some sections treating the county of Clearwater as being created by the act, while in other sections the plain inference of the language used was that another act was to be passed by the legislature, creating Clearwater county. In the first section of the act was a description of territory which it evidently was the intention of the legislature should constitute the county of Clearwater, but there was no declaration anywhere in the act to carry out that intent. It was held that the act did not create a county, as there were no words in the act which expressed that intention, and the courts did not have the authority to create a county by supplying words, as to do so would be to impinge upon the power vested solely in the legislature. The court said: "While courts do, in order to carry out the will of the legislature, expressed in an imperfect way, interpolate punctuation or words evidently intended to be used, yet, when such interpolation comprises the real substance of the act—in this instance, words creating a county—the court is not authorized to make such interpolation."

In Kennahan v. New York (1914) 162 App. Div. 364, 147 N. Y. Supp. 835, it was held that an ordinance designating a certain newspaper to publish election notices, without repealing or referring to a prior ordinance on the same subject, and without stating what political party the newspaper represented, was void. The court said: "The case is controlled by the familiar rule of statutory construction that, if the legislature fails to insert such provisions in the law as will accomplish the result intended, their omission cannot be remedied by construction, and the law must, to that extent, be considered defective and inoperative, the court having no power to interpolate words or phrases."

A court will not insert words in a statute or ordinance which is plain and unambiguous, and does not need the insertion of words to carry out its terms, since to do so would be an act of legislation and not an act of construction.

"Although it seems probable from an examination of the other parts of this act that the legislature intended to confer the power of approval upon the governing body of the township rather than on the township itself, we cannot say that such intent appears beyond doubt. Not to be able to do this is fatal to the claim of the plaintiffs, for the injection of the word 'committee' into the statute under such circumstances would be an act of legislation rather than of construction." Orvil Twp. v. Woodcliff (1897) 61 N. J. L. 107, 38 Atl. 685.

In Barron v. Kaufman (1909) 131 Ky. 642, 115 S. W. 787, it was held that the courts had no power to interpolate the words, "for each meeting attended," in a statute providing for the pay of members of the board of councilmen and board of aldermen. The court said: "The interpolation of words into an act by construction is allowable only when it is necessary in order to rescue the enactment from an absurdity, or to carry into effect a purpose obviously plain from other parts of the act. We have not such a situation here."

In State v. Trapp (1916) 140 La. 425, 73 So. 255, it was held that the court had no power to declare a person guilty of a misdemeanor, where the statute failed to state that the act or conduct declared to be unlawful was a misdemeanor, the court saying: "Courts of justice have nothing more to do with criminal statutes than to apply them to the cases to which the legislature has declared they shall be applied. If the legislature has accidentally or inadvertently failed to express the intention that certain conduct shall constitute a crime or misdemeanor, the courts cannot correct the error or supply the omission, no matter how plainly the conduct in question is within the mischief intended to be remedied by the statute."

In Orvil Twp. v. Woodcliff (N. J.) supra, it was held that the court had no power to insert the word "committee" in a statute conferring the power of approval of the division and apportionment of the liabilities of the township, on a majority either of the township or of the mayor and council of the borough, so that the act would read: "A majority of the township committee." The court said: "Although it seems probable from an examination of the other parts of this act that the legislature intended to confer the power of approval upon the governing body of the township rather than on the township itself, we cannot say that such intent appears beyond doubt. Not to be able to do this is fatal to the claim of the plaintiffs, for the injection of the word 'committee' into the statute, under such circumstances, would be an act of legislation rather than of construction."

In Slingluff v. Weaver (1902) 66 Ohio St. 621, 64 N. E. 574, a statute regulating the jurisdiction of the supreme court was before the court for construction. This act read as follows: "A judgment rendered or a final order made by any circuit court or a judge thereof, court of common pleas, or a judge thereof, probate court, insolvency court, or the superior court or a judge thereof, may be reversed or modified by the supreme court on petition in error, for errors appearing on the record, in any case in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, procedendo, or in which is involved the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or the state of Ohio, or the jurisdiction of any court of this state, or the construction or validity of a treaty or statute of or authority exercised under the United States, or in which the decision is contrary to that of any circuit court, and not in accordance with a previous decision of the supreme court; but no petition in error in such cases except as to the judgment or final order of the circuit court, or a judge thereof, or of the general term of the superior court of Cincinnati, shall be filed without leave of the supreme court, or judge thereof, and the supreme court shall not in any civil cause or proceeding, except when its jurisdiction is original, be required to determine as to the weight of evidence; and on application of any party excepting to a ruling or decision of the circuit court during the trial, or on motion for a new trial, such court shall find from the evidence and state on the record the facts upon which the alleged error arises, or which may be material in determining whether error has intervened or not." The case before the court had been appealed because the court below had sustained a demurrer to a petition for an injunction, and had dismissed the injunction. This class of cases was not included among those which the supreme court had jurisdiction to review under the above statute. The court held that the statute could not be changed by it so as to give the court jurisdiction, since it did not have the power to introduce a doubt not apparent in the language, and then introduce verbal modifications in order to remove the doubt thus created.

In Arnold v. State (1913) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 132 Pac. 1123, wherein it appeared that a statute fixed the punishment for perjury committed on the trial of an indictment for a felony at imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than twenty years, it was held that the court had no power to insert the words, "or information," after the word "indictment." The court said: "This court is in no sense of the word a forum of legislation or an arena for political debate. Where there is an ambiguity in a statutory provision, then we must resort to construction, but we have no power to add to or take from a plain and mandatory provision of the statute."

In Ex parte Brown (1907) 21 S. D. 515, 114 N. W. 303, it was held that under a penal statute commonly known as the "Pure Food Law," it was not permissible to insert the word "drug-gist," where the statute specifically referred to innkeepers, restaurant, boarding house, and hotel keepers. Such words excluded by implication all persons not of the same class as those specifically mentioned. A "casus omissus" cannot be supplied by the court. B. F. D.

v.

FORD MOTOR COMPANY et al., Appts.

Michigan Supreme Court — February 7, 1919.

(— Mich. —, 170 N. W. 668.)

Corporations — diverting funds to humanitarian purposes — compelling payment of dividends.

1. Minority stockholders have a right to force a declaration of dividends of a material portion of the surplus by a corporation dominated by one stockholder, which has a surplus of almost a hundred and twelve million dollars, cash on hand of nearly fifty-four million, and a business producing net profits of nearly sixty millions per year, where the declared policy of the dominating stockholder is to use the surplus for increasing the size of the plant for the semi-eleemosynary purpose of reducing the selling price of the product below what is necessary, for the benefit of the public, and the increase of output for the benefit of employees at high wages, all of which will make the business less profitable.

Definition — capital stock.

2. The term, "capital stock," means the funds, property, or other means contributed or agreed to be contributed by stockholders as the financial basis for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, being made directly through stock subscriptions or indirectly through declaration of stock dividends.

[See 7 R. C. L. 195.]

Statute — interpretation — limitation of capital of corporation.

3. The court cannot, in interpreting a statute limiting the capital of a corporation, assume that because there is a possible reason for a further limitation such further limitation must be implied.

Corporation — statutory limitation of capital — use of profits.

4. A statutory limitation of the capital which may be employed by a corporation does not preclude the use of surplus profits in the business, although the aggregate assets are thereby made to exceed the amount fixed by the statute.

[See 7 R. C. L. 204.]

— ultra vires — operation of smelter.

5. The operation of a smelter to produce iron for its castings is not ultra vires of a corporation organized to manufacture automobiles.

[See 7 R. C. L. 528.]

Monopoly — extension of corporation.

6. The mere expansion of a business to produce and sell a commodity which the public demands, at a price which the public regards as cheap or reasonable, does not violate the Anti-trust Laws or create a monopoly, although the assets used in the business will exceed the amount of capital permitted by statute.

Corporations — powers of directors.

7. A business corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of stockholders, and the powers and discretion of directors are to be exercised to attain that end, and do not extend to the reduction of profits or their nondistribution among stockholders in order to devote them to other purposes.

— discretion of directors — extent.

8. The directors of a corporation have a discretion to be exercised in good faith to control the infinite details of the business, including the wages to be paid employees, the number of working hours, the conditions under which labor shall be carried on, and the price for which the product shall be offered to the public.

Estoppel — to demand dividends — consent to increase of capital.

9. Minority stockholders of a corporation are not estopped to demand proper dividends upon the stock they own, by agreeing to permit an increase in the capital which shall be represented by a stock dividend, and which contemplates a large increase in the volume of business done.

[See 7 R. C. L. 294.]

Corporation — amount of dividends.

10. A corporation whose net earnings are approximately sixty million dollars a year, and which will have a surplus of thirty million after paying for all improvements contemplated, and whose output is promptly turned into cash, may be compelled by minority stockholders to distribute two thirds of the net surplus in dividends.

[See 7 R. C. L. 294.]

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County, in Chancery, in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to require defendants to declare and distribute dividends to the stockholders of the defendant company. Affirmed in part.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

The Ford Motor Company is a corporation, organized and existing under Act No. 232 of the Public Acts of 1903, entitled: "An act to revise and consolidate the laws providing for the incorporation of manufacturing and mercantile companies or any union of the two, and for the incorporation of companies for carrying on any other lawful business, except such as are precluded from organization under this act by its express provisions, and to prescribe the powers and fix the duties and liabilities of such corporations."

Section 2 of the act relates, in part, to the articles of association, and what shall appear in them, and the fourth subdivision of this section reads: "Fourth. The amount of the total authorized capital stock which shall not be less than one thousand dollars, and not more than twenty-five million dollars; the amount of capital stock subscribed which shall not be less than 50 per cent of the authorized capital stock; the articles may provide for common and preferred stock subject to § 35, and in that case shall contain an exact statement of the terms upon which the common and preferred stocks are created, and the amount of each subscribed, and the amount of each paid in."

In 1917 (Pub. Acts 1917, No. 254), the maximum of capital stock was fixed at $50,000,000.

The second clause of the ninth subdivision of the same section reads, in part, as follows: "The amount of the capital stock and number of shares of every corporation organized under this act may be increased or diminished at any annual meeting of the stockholders, or at a special meeting expressly called for that purpose, by a vote of two thirds of the capital stock of the corporation."

Section 14 reads: "Every such corporation shall have power to purchase, hold and convey all such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation shall require, and all other real and personal estate which shall have been bona fide conveyed or mortgaged to said corporation by way of security, or in satisfaction of debts. Any corporation formed under this act may purchase real or personal property necessary for its business, and issue its authorized capital stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor, and the capital stock so issued shall be full paid stock, and not liable to any further call, neither shall the holder thereof be liable to any further payment under any of the provisions of this act, except the liability imposed by § 29; and in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the directors as to the value of the property shall be conclusive. And in addition to the powers hereinbefore enumerated, every corporation organized under this act shall possess and exercise all such rights and powers as are necessarily incidental to the exercise of the powers expressly granted herein. It may also purchase and hold any grant of land made by the government to aid in any work of internal improvement."

To this was added by amendment in 1917: "Subject to the limitations of the laws of this state and of the United States with respect to illegal restraints of trade, every such corporation shall have power, in furtherance of the objects of its organization, to hold shares of stock of other corporations organized under the laws of this or any other state for purposes similar to those for which corporations may be organized under this act: Provided, such other corporations be formed as subsidiary thereto and for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business or the natural or legitimate branches or extensions thereof."

The articles of association were executed June 16, 1903, and acknowledged on that day by the parties associating. In the articles the capital stock is fixed at the sum of $150,000, with 1,500 shares of the par value of $100 each. It is recited therein that the amount of capital stock subscribed is $100,000, and that said sum is actually paid in, $49,000 in cash and $51,000 in other property. The other property described is: Letters patent, issued and applied for, valued at $40,000; machinery and stock, $10,000; contracts for supplies, $1,000. Article II. of the articles of association reads: "The purpose or purposes of this corporation are as follows: To purchase, manufacture, and placing on the market for sale of automobiles, or the purchase, manufacture and placing on the market for sale of motors and of devices and appliances incident to their construction and operation."

The parties in the first instance associating, who signed the articles, included Henry Ford, whose subscription was for 255 shares, John F. Dodge, Horace E. Dodge, the plaintiffs, Horace H. Rackham and James Couzens, who each subscribed for fifty shares, and several other persons. The company began business in the month of June, 1903. In the year 1908, its articles were amended and the capital stock increased from $150,000 to $2,000,000, the number of shares being increased to 20,000; and in the certificate, made in November, 1908, evidencing the increase of capital stock, it was recited:

"The total amount of stock, including such increase actually paid in, is the sum of two million ($2,000,000) dollars, of which one million eight hundred and fifty thousand ($1,850,000) dollars of the increase and fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars of the original capital stock not subscribed, has been paid in by the surrender of all the stockholders to the corporation of their respective claim and right to dividends duly declared by the board of directors of said corporation out of the surplus of said company to the amount of one million nine hundred thousand ($1,900,000) dollars.

"The amount of capital stock subscribed is the sum of two million ($2,000,000) dollars; the amount of said stock actually paid in at the date thereof is the sum of two million ($2,000,000) dollars, of which one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars represents the capital stock originally subscribed and paid in, and one million nine hundred thousand ($1,900,000) dollars by surrender to the corporation by all stockholders of their claim to dividends duly declared by the board of directors payable out of surplus."

The business of the company continued to expand. The cars it manufactured met a public demand, and were profitably marketed, so that, in addition to regular quarterly dividends equal to 5 per cent monthly on the capital stock of $2,000,000, its board of directors declared and the company paid special dividends: December 13, 1911, $1,000,000; May 15, 1912, $2,000,000; July 11, 1912, $2,000,000; June 16, 1913, $10,000,000; May 14, 1914, $2,000,000; June 12, 1914, $2,000,000; July 6, 1914, $2,000,000; July 23, 1914, $2,000,000; August 23, 1914, $3,000,000; May 28, 1915, $10,000,000; October 13, 1915, $5,000,000, a total of $41,000,000 in special dividends. Sales and profits for several years were: Year ending September 30, 1910, 18,664 cars, $4,521,509.51. Year ending September 30, 1911, 34,466 cars, $6,275,031.07. Year ending September 30, 1912, 68,544 cars, $13,057,312.24. Year ending September 30, 1913, 168,304 cars, $25,046,767.43. Year ending September 30, 1914, 248,307 cars, $30,338,454.63. Ten months ending July 31, 1915, 264,351 cars, $24,641,423.17. Year ending July 31, 1916, 472,350 cars, $59,994,918.01.

The surplus above capital stock was, September 30, 1912, $14,745,095.67, and was increased year by year to $28,124,173.68, $48,827,032.07, $59,135,770.66. July 31, 1916, it was $111,960,907.53. Originally, the car made by the Ford Motor Company sold for more than $900. From time to time, the selling price was lowered and the car itself improved until in the year ending July 31, 1916, it sold for $440. Up to July 31, 1916, it had sold 1,272,986 cars at a profit of $173,895,416.06. As the cars in use multiplied, sales of parts and of repairs increased, so that, in the year ending July 31, 1916, the gross profit from repairs and parts was $3,915,778.94; sales being more than $600,000 for each of the months of May, June, and July. For the year beginning August 1, 1916, the price of the car was reduced $80 to $360.

The following is admitted to be a substantially correct statement of the financial affairs of the company on July 31, 1916:

From a mere assembling plant, the plant of the Ford Motor Company came to be a manufacturing plant, in which it made many of the parts of the car which in the beginning it had purchased from others. At no time has it been able to meet the demand for its cars or in a large way to enter upon the manufacture of motor trucks.

No special dividend having been paid after October, 1915 (a special dividend of $2,000,000 was declared in November, 1916, before the filing of the answers), the plaintiffs, who together own 2,000 shares, or one tenth of the entire capital stock of the Ford Motor Company, on the 2d of November, 1916, filed in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in chancery, their bill of complaint, which bill was later, upon leave granted, on April 26, 1917, amended, in which bill they charge that since 1914 they have not been represented on the board of directors of the Ford Motor Company, and that since that time the policy of the board of directors has been dominated and controlled absolutely by Henry Ford, the president of the company, who owns and for several years has owned 58 per cent of the entire capital stock of the company; that the directors of the company are Henry Ford, David H. Gray, Horace H. Rackham, F. L. Klingensmith, and James Couzens, and the executive officers Henry Ford, president, F. L. Klingensmith, treasurer, and Edsel B. Ford, son of Henry Ford, secretary; that after the filing of the original, and before the filing of the amended, bill, at the annual meeting of the stockholders, David H. Gray retired from the board of directors, and Edsel B. Ford was elected and is acting as a director. Setting up that on the 31st of July, 1916, the end of its last fiscal year, the said Henry Ford gave out for publication a statement of the financial condition of the company (the same as hereinabove set out), that for a number of years a regular dividend, payable quarterly, equal to 5 per cent monthly upon the authorized capital stock, and the special dividends hereinbefore referred to, had been paid, it is charged that notwithstanding the earnings for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916, the Ford Motor Company has not, since that date, declared any special dividends: "And the said Henry Ford, president of the company, has declared it to be the settled policy of the company not to pay in the future any special dividends, but to put back into the business for the future all of the earnings of the company, other than the regular dividend of five per cent (5 %) monthly upon the authorized capital stock of the company—two million dollars ($2,000,000)."

This declaration of the future policy, it is charged in the bill, was published in the public press in the city of Detroit and throughout the United States in substantially the following language: "'My ambition,' declared Mr. Ford, 'is to employ still more men; to spread the benefits of this industrial system to the greatest possible number, to help them to build up their lives and their homes. To do this, we are putting the greatest share of our profits back into the business.'"

It is charged further that the said Henry Ford stated to plaintiffs personally, in substance, that as all the stockholders had received back in dividends more than they had invested they were not entitled to receive anything additional to the regular dividend of 5 per cent a month, and that it was not his policy to have larger dividends declared in the future, and that the profits and earnings of the company would be put back into the business for the purpose of extending its operations and increasing the number of its employees, and that, inasmuch as the profits were to be represented by investment in plants and capital investment, the stockholders would have no right to complain. It is charged (paragraph 16) that the said Henry Ford, "dominating and controlling the policy of said company, has declared it to be his purpose—and he has actually engaged in negotiations looking to carrying such purposes into effect—to invest millions of dollars of the company's money in the purchase of iron ore mines in the Northern peninsula of Michigan or state of Minnesota; to acquire by purchase or have built ships for the purpose of transporting such ore to smelters to be erected on the River Rouge, adjacent to Detroit, in the county of Wayne and state of Michigan; and to construct and install steel manufacturing plants to produce steel products to be used in the manufacture of cars at the factory of said company; and by this means to deprive the stockholders of the company of the fair and reasonable returns upon their investment by way of dividends to be declared upon their stockholding interest in said company."

Setting up that the present invested assets of the company, exclusive of cash on hand, as of July 31, 1916, represented more than thirty times the present authorized capital of the company, and 2½ times the maximum limit ($25,000,000) fixed by the laws of the state of Michigan for capitalization of such companies (now $50,000,000), it is charged that the present investment in capital and assets constitutes an unlawful investment of the earnings, and that the continued investment of earnings would be a continuation of such unlawful policy. Setting up unsuccessful efforts to secure a conference with Mr. Ford for the purpose of discussing the question, and asking that there be a distribution of a part of the accumulations, it is charged: That on September 28, 1916, plaintiffs addressed to him, and had delivered to him by registered letter, the following communication:

"We have for some time, as you know, been endeavoring to make an appointment to see you, for the purpose—as you assumed and informed one of your associates—of discussing the affairs of the Ford Motor Company from the standpoint of our interest as stockholders, and with a view to securing action by the board of directors looking to a very substantial distribution from its cash surplus as dividends.

"Not having been able to make an appointment to discuss the matter with you personally, as we very much desired to do, we write you this letter upon the subject.

"The condition shown by your recent financial statement—showing approximately $60,000,000 of net profits for the past year and cash surplus in bank exceeding $50,000,000—it seems to us would suggest, without the action being requested, the propriety of the board taking prompt action to distribute a large part of the accumulated cash surplus as dividends to the stockholders to whom it belongs.

"While we would be sorry to have any controversy over the matter, we feel that your attitude toward the stockholders of the company is entirely unwarranted.

"The statements that you have made—that the stockholders are and have been receiving as dividends all they are entitled to—shows a most extraordinary state of mind, if it represents your real feelings.

"While a dividend of 5 per cent per month, 60 per cent per annum, on the capital stock of the company, $2,000,000, on its face would seem to be a large dividend—the fact is, however, that the assets of the company representing its surplus is as much the property of the stockholders as the assets representing the capital stock, and the stockholders are as much entitled to a dividend that will give them returns on their surplus investment as their capital stock.

"Looking at the situation in this way, the dividend being paid the stockholders is only a little above 1 per cent on their capital employed in the business, and entirely out of proportion to what the stockholders are entitled to.

"In view of the existing circumstances, we ask that you promptly call a meeting of the board of directors to consider the situation and lay before them our views as stockholders, as outlined in this letter, and we desire to say in this connection that we conceive it to be the duty of the board of directors to distribute as a minimum a special dividend of not less than 50 per cent of the accumulated cash surplus of the company.

"Another matter that we desire brought to the attention of the board is our contention, as stockholders, that the company has no right to use the company's earnings in the continued extension of the plants and property of the company; indeed, from our point of view, they have already exceeded their authority in this direction.

"We would be pleased to have your acknowledgment of the receipt of this letter, and advise that you have called a meeting of the board of directors for the purpose of considering and acting upon the matters referred to in it."

And that they sent on the same day copies to each of the members of the board of directors of the Ford Motor Company, and one to Edsel B. Ford, secretary. That, although the said Henry Ford and each of the directors were in the city of Detroit at the time of the receipt of such communication, no attention was paid to it and no acknowledgment made by said Henry Ford personally, but in his behalf his son, Edsel, under date October 10, 1916, replied:

"I beg to acknowledge due receipt of your letter of September 23, 1916, and to say that it would have been answered before this but for my absence from town for a considerable length of time, and pressure of other matters.

"It seems to me, in view of all the conditions of business and our extensions, which have been determined upon for so long a time past and to which we have been working, that it would not be wise to increase the dividends at the present time; but, nevertheless, I will lay your letter before the board of directors, and we will give your views regarding the increase of dividends and extensions full consideration at our next meeting."

Plaintiffs addressed another letter to Mr. Ford, dated October 11th, acknowledging the receipt of the communication of October 10th, and containing, among other things, the following:

"Rumors are current to the effect that the company has very ambitious plans for the expansion of the operations of the company under consideration, and negotiations looking to carrying them into effect that would involve the disbursement of a large part of the cash assets of the company.

"We would thank you very much to advise us by early mail as to whether there is any foundation for the rumors referred to, and that plans for the extension or expansion of the operations of business of the company that would absorb any considerable part of the company's present resources are under consideration, and the status of any negotiations relating thereto. In short, as stockholders, we would ask to be advised promptly as to what plans for the enlargement of the plants, property, or operations are under way, or under consideration.

"Of course, it would be idle to have the board of directors consider the question of disbursing the cash assets of the company in dividends, if, before the board has considered our request, the same have been appropriated in the directions referred to.

"We would respectfully urge that we be given a prompt and full reply to this letter."

And it is charged that up to the date of filing the bill no reply had been received or acknowledgment of said communication.

Paragraphs 25, 26, 27, and 28 of the bill read:

"(25) That during the year ending July 31, 1916, the output of the said Ford Company's product amounted to approximately five hundred thousand (500,000) automobiles, yielding to the company, as stated, a net profit of sixty million dollars ($60,000,000). That although there was no reason to conclude that said company could not repeat its production of 500,000 cars during the succeeding year and sell the same readily at the price at which they had been sold in the previous year, and although labor and material costs were increasing, the said Henry Ford forced upon the board of directors his policy of reducing the price of such cars by eighty dollars ($80) per car, making a difference in the net sales price of the product of said company for the year ending July 31, 1917, of forty million dollars ($40,000,000). That such policy was adopted only for the purpose of enabling him to continue to carry out the policy he had decided upon to extend the operations and increase the said company's output of manufactured automobiles and a production schedule for the year July 31, 1916, to July 31, 1917, for eight hundred thousand (800,000) cars was adopted. That in order to prepare for such increased production the company is now, in carrying out such policy of said Henry Ford, engaged in practically duplicating the enormous plant of the company at Highland Park in the county of Wayne and state of Michigan, and in making other large expenditures and preparing to make other expenditures involving millions of dollars in carrying out such plan of the expansion of the business plants and property of the company.

"(26) That unless restrained by the injunction of this honorable court, the said Henry Ford will cause the cash assets that would otherwise be available for dividends, to be disbursed and invested in fixed capital assets.

"(27) In the face of the increased labor and material cost and the uncertain conditions that will prevail in the business world at the termination of the present World War, the policy of said Henry Ford, in continuing the expansion of the business of said corporation, is reckless in the extreme, and seriously jeopardizes the interest of your orators as stockholders in said corporation.

ardizes the interest of your orators as stockholders in said corporation.

"(28) That there are many other corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing cars in competition with the only car manufactured by the Ford Motor Company, to wit, the class recognized in the trade as 'low-priced cars.' That the annual production of such other companies of such class of cars runs into the hundreds of thousands of cars per annum. That if the said Henry Ford is permitted to continue the policy that he has inaugurated and announced he is determined to carry out, of increasing production, reducing the price of cars, and increasing the capital investments in the conduct of such business by withholding the dividends from stockholders to which they are entitled, the necessary result will be the destruction of competition on the sale of the class of cars manufactured by such corporation and the creation of a complete monopoly in the manufacture and sale of such cars, in violation of the state, Federal, and common law."

Paragraphs 30 and 31 read:

"(30) That by reason of the declared policy of said Henry Ford not to pay dividends and to continue the expansion of the business of said company, including the risks involved in various enterprises proposed to be carried on by said company, your orators' interest in said Ford Motor Company, which is worth not less than $50,000,000, is practically limited to a valuation fixed by the dividends so regularly to be declared, which, as stated, amount to little more than 1 per cent upon the actual capital investment of the stockholders of the company in the business of said corporation and renders the disposition of your orators' stockholding interest in said corporation, except at a sacrifice, impossible.

"(31) That the operations of said corporation should, by the injunction of this honorable court, be limited at least to the conduct of the company's business within the limits of its present capital investment, not including its cash accumulations, and your orators' interests as such stockholders should not be put in jeopardy by the reckless ventures proposed to be entered upon in connection with the carrying out of the policy of expansion of the said Henry Ford as above herein outlined."

Plaintiffs ask for an injunction to restrain the carrying out of the alleged declared policy of Mr. Ford and the company, for a decree requiring the distribution to stockholders of at least 75 per cent of the accumulated cash surplus, and for the future that they be required to distribute all of the earnings of the company except such as may be reasonably required for emergency purposes in the conduct of the business.

The answer of the Ford Motor Company, which was filed November 28, 1916, admits most of the allegations in the plaintiffs' bill of complaint, denying, upon information and belief, those in paragraph 16 of the bill, and declining to answer those charges personal to Mr. Henry Ford. It sets out meetings of the board of directors of the 31st of October, 2d of November, and 8th of November, 1916. It denies that Henry Ford forced upon the board of directors his policy of reducing the price of cars by $80, and says that the action of the board in that behalf was unanimous and made after careful consideration. It admits that it has decided to increase the output of the company and is engaged in practically duplicating its plant at Highland Park; that plans therefor have been under consideration and practically agreed upon for a year, and the lands necessary for the expansion acquired a year before this suit was begun, and their acquisition laid before the board on the 28th of January, 1916, and ratified; that these plans were made public as early as December, 1915; and, upon information and belief, it is alleged that the plaintiffs knew all about it and never made any complaint until they filed their bill in this cause, unless the letter set forth in the bill of complaint can be called a complaint; that it has been the policy of the company, and its practice for eight or ten years, to cut the price of cars and increase the output, a plan which has been productive of great prosperity, and that what was done the 1st of August, 1916, was strictly in accordance with this policy; that it was not carried out by cutting the price of cars August 1, 1915, because after full discussion it was determined that the proposed expansions of business were necessary to secure the continued success of the company, and that a considerable additional sum ought to be accumulated for the purpose of extensions and making the improvements complained of; that this policy for the year ending July 31, 1916, was understood by all the directors and the management and, it is believed, by all of the stockholders, including the plaintiffs; that the expansion is well under way; building operations are being carried on; that there is a great demand for Ford trucks which could not be supplied without such expansion; that only such extensions and expansions are contemplated as are shown in the estimates found in the minutes of the directors' meeting. It is denied that the proposed expansions jeopardize the interests of the plaintiffs, and asserted that they are in accordance with the best interests of the company and in pursuance of their past policy. It is denied that the policy continued would destroy competition, and any idea of creating a monopoly is denied. The allegations in regard to mining, shipping, and transporting iron ore are denied, or that anything is being done or contemplated which will result in disaster. Any plan or purpose or thought to injure or impair the value of plaintiffs' capital stock is denied, while it is asserted that their interests will be improved. The minutes attached to this answer showing action of the board of directors at meetings held in October and November, 1916, are voluminous. They show, among other things, approval of a purchase of property in the city of New York, costing $560,052.40. They show discussion of plans regarding a building to be erected on such property, and deferred action. They show that various purchases of property made during the year 1916, from May to August, in Chicago, Detroit, Kansas City, New Jersey, Cleveland, Ohio, Iowa, costing upwards of $900,000, were ratified, and an assembly plant ordered to be constructed at Des Moines, Iowa, at approximately the cost of $420,000. The minutes of the meeting of the board of directors, held November 2, 1916, after providing for the purchase of certain lands adjacent to the plant of the defendant company, contain the following:

Whereas, the officers have proceeded with the preparations for the increase of the plant and have started the erection of some of the buildings to that end, and having incurred expenditures in connection therewith, the details of which have been laid before the board and duly considered, together with approximate estimates of the total cost of such extensions with explanations by the officers and engineers of this company, and which approximate estimates so submitted by the officers and engineers are as follows:

|--|----------------|
| Manufacturing building, 4-story, 800x600 .....             | $3,000,000.00 |

| Total .....  | $9,895,000.00 |

Now, therefore, resolved that the proceedings and action heretofore taken and the expenditures made in the works aforesaid be hereby ratified and confirmed; and further resolved, that the officers are authorized to proceed with such plans for building extensions, purchase of equipment, tools, and fixtures as in their judgment most advantageous and economical for this company, as follows, viz.:

| And the officers are empowered to co-operate in the construction of the Oakland avenue viaduct on the most advantageous terms practicable for this company—estimated .... | $150,000.00   |

With respect to the manufacturing building, four-story, 800x600, the body plant building, dry kilns, body plant equipment, the addition to office building and the John R street viaduct, resolved that consideration thereof be deferred until a later date.

And, with respect to certain new operations, contain the following:

The adoption of the following resolution was moved by Mr. Couzens and supported by Mr. Rackham:

Whereas this company has for some time past been making preparations looking to the manufacture of its own iron and the erection of a manufacturing plant on lands to be acquired from Mr. Henry Ford at the River Rouge, Wayne county, Michigan, for that purpose, and whereas approximate estimates have been submitted by the company's engineers for such work as follows:

|--|-----------------|
| Two (2) 500-ton blast furnaces, stoves, blowing engines, ore and stock bins and ore handling equipment ..... | $4,500,000.00  |
| Ore dock and river dock front .....  | 1,000,000.00    |
| Turning basin, canal dredging, etc. ....   | 250,000.00      |
| 1,000-ton by-product coke oven plant, with necessary benzol plant .....                                      | 2,000,000.00    |
| Power plant .....  | 1,500,000.00    |
| Foundry buildings .....  | 550,000.00      |
| Foundry equipment .....  | 250,000.00      |
| Malleable foundry .....  | 500,000.00      |
| Malleable foundry equipment .....  | 150,000.00      |
| Office building .....  | 150,000.00      |
| Office building equipment .....  | 25,000.00       |
| Track and transportation equipment .....   | 250,000.00      |
| Miscellaneous buildings ....   | 200,000.00      |
| Total .....  | $11,325,000.00 |

And whereas, certain steps have been taken by the management preliminary to such work, including the hiring of an engineer, preparation of plans, etc.

Now, therefore, resolved that the undertaking aforesaid be proceeded with, that the action heretofore taken in that behalf be ratified and confirmed, and the officers and management are authorized to go forward with said works as in their judgment may be most advantageous and economical to this company and they are authorized to execute and carry out necessary contracts in connection with such work and make all payments required in the course thereof.

And resolved, that this company purchase of Henry Ford for the purposes aforesaid the following described lands, viz.:—Lands in Springwells township, Wayne county, Michigan, described as follows: Bounded on the north by the Michigan Central Railroad, bounded on the east by the Pere Marquette Railroad, on the south by Dix avenue and River Rouge, and on the west by a line approximately 50 feet west of the east line of P. C. 29 extended to the River Rouge—at the cost thereof to Mr. Ford with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, approximately $700,000, and the officers are instructed to accept conveyances from Mr. Ford and to pay the price stated upon transfer being completed, and Resolved further, that the expense of turning basin and dredging of the canal, as shown upon the plans of the engineers, half of such canal being upon the lands of Mr. Ford and half upon the lands of this company, be borne equally by this company and by Mr. Ford, and that the management be authorized to proceed with such work and make the necessary arrangements to divide the expense.

Carried unanimously.

A further resolution was offered to build a building on property owned by the company in New York city for offices and salesroom, and to lease the balance of the building for hotel purposes; the building to cost approximately $740,000. At the directors' meeting held November 8, 1916, a dividend of 100 per cent on the capital stock was ordered paid, and the resolution with respect to the hotel building in New York city carried. At a meeting of directors held November 13, 1916, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "It was moved, supported and unanimously carried that in view of written reports of Engineers Mayo and Kennedy (hereto attached) and the oral report of the president of the company, that, all things considered, it seems more desirable to locate the proposed blast furnaces, steel plant, and other extensions on the location on River Rouge, rather than on the Detroit river, and that the officers of the company are authorized and are hereby authorized to proceed with the preparations for such extensions and acquiring of the land as originally passed at the directors' meeting of November 2, 1916, but that no new contracts be entered into until the injunction against the directors has been disposed of."

The answer of Henry Ford is a repetition in many respects of the matter contained in the answer of the Ford Motor Company. He denies that he has declared it to be the settled policy of the company not to pay any special dividends, but to put back into the business for the future all the earnings of the company other than the regular dividends of 5 per cent monthly. He denies that he made a declaration as to his future policy as controlling stockholder in fixing the policy for the management of the corporation. He admits that he used the language substantially set out in the 13th paragraph of the bill, hereinbefore set out, and he does not deny, but admits, that his ambition is as therein stated, but that his action as a director will be controlled by future conditions, and with due respect to the interests of all concerned. He declares that he has been and always is open to argument and conviction as to what is best and what is right in the conduct of the affairs of the Ford Motor Company. He denies that he stated personally to plaintiffs in substance that as all of the stockholders had received back in dividends more than they had invested they were not entitled to receive anything additional to the regular dividend of 5 per cent per month, and that it was not his policy to have larger dividends declared in the future, and that the proceeds and earnings of the company would be put back into the business, etc. He denies the allegations of the 16th subdivision of the bill, and specifically, "defendant denies that he has declared it to be his purpose to invest millions of dollars of the company's money in the purchase of iron ore mines anywhere, or to acquire by purchase or have built ships for the purpose of transporting ore. He admits that he caused an investigation to be made relative to obtaining the necessary ore for the proposed blast furnaces herein-after referred to, but upon having such investigation made several months ago he found that there was abundant competition in the iron ore market, and that it was wholly unnecessary and undesirable to acquire ore in any other way than by purchase, and therefore all thought in that direction was abandoned. The same is true with respect to the acquisition of ships for the transportation of ore. This defendant says that the Ford Motor Company has for more than a year past been laying plans publicly and openly for the building of blast furnaces, stoves, blowing engines, coke ovens, foundry buildings and equipment, malleable foundries and equipment and the necessary accompaniments therefor, for the purpose of producing the iron used in the construction of the cars of the Ford Motor Company. That some contracts have been entered into by the company to that end, and some substantial amounts paid out upon the preliminary work. He shows that such blast furnaces and the works above described will be for the great benefit and advantage of the company, not only in the direct saving of cost of iron parts, but in the improvement of the quality thereof. He further shows that the present plans do not contemplate the manufacture of steel, but that in the future it is hoped to be able to produce at comparatively small increased expense the steel required by the Ford Motor Company in the manufacture of its cars. This defendant denies absolutely the allegation of the 16th subdivision that by the means stated in said subdivision 16, or in any other way, that this defendant proposed to deprive the stockholders of the company of the fair and reasonable return upon their investments."

He answers the charges in the bill respecting attempts on the part of plaintiffs to have an interview with him, explaining why a desired interview did not take place, says he supposed that the proposed interview related to a desire on the part of plaintiffs to sell their stock in the Ford Motor Company to him, as they had previously attempted to do. He admits the receipt of letters referred to in the bill of complaint. He admits that the letter of October 11th, written by the plaintiffs, was not answered until on or about November 3d, but he denies that in the meantime he continued to carry out plans to disburse the cash of the company so that there would not be funds available for declaring dividends.

The 25th paragraph of the answer is as follows: "(25) This defendant denies that he forced upon the board of directors his policy of reducing the price of such cars by $80 per car, and says that the action of the board was unanimous thereon after careful consideration. This defendant admits that it was decided to increase the output of the company, and admits that the company is engaged in practically duplicating the plant at Highland Park. He shows that the plans therefor have been under discussion and have been adopted for practically a year past, and that the entire organization has been working to that end. He shows that most of the lands necessary for such expansion for the Highland Park plant were acquired nearly a year ago. That the plans had been made public as early as last December, and upon information and belief he shows that the plaintiffs knew all about it, and that they never made any complaint with respect to it until the time of filing the bill herein, unless the letters referred to in the bill, written by the plaintiffs, could be said to be such complaint. This defendant shows that it has been the practice of the Ford Motor Company, for the past eight or ten years, to cut the price of the car annually and to increase the output. That such policy has been productive of great prosperity to the company and to its stockholders. That what was done in that regard on the 1st of August, 1916, was strictly in pursuance of the regular policy of the company. That this policy of cutting the price was not carried out on the 1st of August, 1915, because in the counsels of the company, among its active managers, it was, after full discussion, decided that the proposed expansion and buildings were necessary to the continued success of the company, and that it would be wiser and better not to cut the price during the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916, in order that a considerable additional fund might be accumulated for the very purpose of building the extensions and making the improvements that are now being complained of by the plaintiffs. This policy so adopted for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916, was thoroughly understood by all the directors and active members of the management, and, as this defendant is informed and believes, by all of the stockholders, including the plaintiffs. Original price of the touring car which is now sold at $360 was upwards of $900, being substantially the same car, although it has been greatly improved in many respects since the time when it was sold at $900 and upwards. The cuts in the price have been made substantially every year, except for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916. This defendant has every reason to believe that the action of the board of directors in reducing the price for the current year was very wise, and this defendant denies that it was adopted for any reason except the permanent good of the company. This defendant admits that construction is now under way and has been for months past in increasing and practically duplicating the size of the plant at Highland Park. Much of the machinery for such expansion has heretofore been ordered, the exact particulars of which will be furnished to the court. This defendant was not present at the meeting of the board of November 2d. He is informed that the reason why the appropriation for the large building referred to in the estimate was not passed was that construction could not commence until the opening of spring. Building A extension is now approaching completion. The Ford Motor Company is now far behind its orders. The expansion is absolutely essential for the continued prosperity and success of the corporation. There is a great demand for Ford trucks, but the manufacturing department of the company has been unable to supply the demand, and is now utterly unable to meet the demand. It is estimated by the manufacturing department that it cannot turn out to exceed ten thousand trucks this year, whereas it is the estimate of the sales department that one hundred thousand could be sold if they could be turned out."

Paragraph 27 of the answer reads: "(27) This defendant denies that proposed expansion is reckless or that it threatens to jeopardize the interest of the plaintiff, but shows that the same is strictly in accordance with the best interests of the company and its stockholders, and strictly in pursuance of the past policy of the company. That the proposed expansion and extension are practical, feasible, and have only been decided upon after the most careful investigation and advice of experts of the highest obtainable capacity."

Paragraph 36 reads: "(36) Further answering, this defendant shows that personally he has always been in favor of maintaining very large cash balances; that he has always been opposed to borrowing money, and that he has urged the policy of paying cash for extensions and expansions and other expenses; that he has often in the past yielded his better judgment in the extent of dividends to be paid after discussion with other members of the board; that some of the large dividends paid have been against this defendant's better judgment, but after discussing it he has yielded his judgment to the other members of the board, who at the present time are practically the same as during all the past successful years of the corporation, although Mr. John F. Dodge, who was a member for a number of years; retired on or about the 18th day of August, 1913. This defendant shows that he has no fixed and unalterable views on the subject of dividends, but is always ready and willing to discuss with other members of the board what seems to be right under the circumstances. Inasmuch as the company was contemplating the entering upon large enterprises of expansion involving large amounts of cash, this defendant has insisted upon great caution in the matter of dividends, particularly in view of the conditions of business throughout the world. This defendant shows that the expenditures of the Ford Motor Company from day to day are very great, and its requirements of cash are enormous. He shows that if, by any chance, there should be a sudden falling off of business or collapse of business, that it would require great sums of money to carry on the business of the company, and his idea is to be well fortified against emergencies. This defendant is opposed to any policy which would necessitate the discharge of large number of employees in case there should be a sudden depression of business, if there be any way to avoid it, and this defendant believes that the latter methods and policies ultimately redound to the best financial interests of the company and its stockholders. This defendant is not in favor of paying out in dividends the surplus of the company to the danger point, or any point where it could be regarded as risky in the least degree. This defendant further shows that he is not in favor of keeping up the price of the car to the highest possible point that the public will apparently stand for the time being, but he is in favor of the policy of reducing the price of the car from time to time, as the safety and welfare of the company and stockholders will dictate, since he believes such to be a better permanent policy for the company. Such always has been the policy adopted in the past, and he believes that such has been one of the causes of the unexampled success of the company."

Defendants Klingensmith and Rackham also answered the bill, their answers being generally in accord with those of the Ford Motor Company and Mr. Ford.

All of the answers had been filed on November 28th, and were used in a showing, in opposition to plaintiffs' application for an injunction, an order to show cause and a restraining order having been made November 2d. The motion for injunction came on to be heard November 29th, in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in chancery, three circuit judges sitting. An opinion upon the application for a temporary injunction was filed December 9, 1916. The conclusions of two of said judges are expressed in the following excerpt from the opinion:

"We are of the opinion that the expansion of the business, by way of the establishment of a smelting plant at the River Rouge, should be restrained, pending an early hearing upon the question of whether the diverting of accumulated cash profits to that end is an abuse of discretion on the part of the directors. This involves a mixed question of fact and law, and we feel that the allegations of the bill, and the showing in support thereof, make this a question to be decided only on a hearing upon the merits, and therefore matters should stand as they are, pending such hearing."

"Considering the importance of the questions involved, we feel there should be a hearing on the merits within sixty days. Let an injunction issue, restraining defendants from using accumulated cash profits on hand for the establishment of a smelting plant."

The third judge concurred in granting the injunction, but refused to concur in the conclusion that the defendant corporation could lawfully engage in the smelting business. An order having been entered in the circuit court in accordance with the opinion, application was made to the supreme court for a writ of mandamus to vacate and set aside said order. Upon that application, it appearing that considerable contracts had been made, that loss would attend an interruption of the carrying out of plans, and that Mr. Ford and others had offered to indemnify the company and plaintiffs, an alternative order was issued, whereupon the order for temporary injunction was modified in such way as to permit the use of the accumulated cash profits of the Ford Motor Company, not exceeding $10,000,000, for the establishment of a smelting plant during the pendency of this suit and until the further order of the court, upon condition that a bond in the sum of $10,000,000, conditioned to refund to the Ford Motor Company all money so used, be given, and also conditioned that such obligation may be enforced against such defendants by the final decree herein, or by supplemental proceedings in this cause. Thereupon Messrs. Ford, Rackham, and Klingensmith made their writing obligatory in accordance with said order, and the bond was approved January 6, 1917.

The cause came on for hearing in open court on the 21st of May, 1917. A large volume of testimony was taken, with the result that a decree was entered December 5, 1917, in and by which it is decreed that within thirty days from the entry thereof the directors of the Ford Motor Company declare a dividend upon all of the shares of stock in an amount equivalent to one half of, and payable out of, the accumulated cash surplus of said Ford Motor Company, on hand at the close of the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916, less the aggregate amount of the special dividends declared and paid after the filing of the bill and during the year ending July 31, 1917; the amount to be declared being $19,275,385.96. It was further decreed:

"Third. The owning, holding, or operating by the defendant Ford Motor Company of, and the using or appropriating or incurring obligations which might require or necessitate the using or appropriating of any funds or other property of said defendant Ford Motor Company for, a smelting plant or blast furnace or furnaces of the kind or character which the proofs adduced herein show to be contemplated and now in course of construction on or near the River Rouge, and of any lands, buildings, machinery, or equipment therefor, and other incident thereof, is without authority of law, and is permanently and absolutely restrained and enjoined.

"Fourth. The increase of the fixed capital assets of the defendant Ford Motor Company, beyond those at the date of the entry hereof owned and held by the said corporation, is without authority of law, and is permanently and absolutely restrained and enjoined. The date of the entry hereof is taken, instead of the date of the objections raised by plaintiffs to any such increase, at the suggestion of plaintiffs, so that said corporation shall not be in any wise embarrassed through the wrongful acts of the individual defendants. The said fixed capital assets so owned and held at the date of the entry hereof shall be deemed to include such further investment as may be necessary to complete or to complement the same so as to be properly usable in the conduct of the regular business of the said corporation. The said fixed capital assets shall be deemed to be exclusive of those of the kind or character contemplated in the next preceding paragraph hereof.

"The holding of liquid assets (including accumulations of and from the earnings and profits of regular business operations from time to time) by the defendant Ford Motor Company, in excess of such as may be reasonably required in the proper conduct and carrying on of the business and operations of said corporation in connection with, and by the use of, the fixed capital assets, limited as aforesaid, is likewise without authority of law, and is permanently and absolutely restrained and enjoined, and said defendant corporation and its board of directors, the individual defendants herein and their respective successors in office, are directed and commanded to declare and distribute, as dividends to the stockholders, any such excess which may now exist or may accrue from time to time hereafter. The term, 'liquid assets,' as used herein, shall be deemed to include all assets other than fixed capital assets within the meaning generally understood in business of said last-mentioned term.

"The intent and purpose of this subdivision 'fourth' of this decree is to fix a maximum limit for the aggregate assets of the defendant Ford Motor Company, and, if it be practicable to increase either class (fixed or liquid) of assets out of the other without affecting the aggregate, such increase shall be proper—the limit in this subdivision stated for each class having been adopted as the most convenient manner of stating the limit of the aggregate."

The defendants Ford, Rackham, and Klingensmith are ordered to account for any and all sums used since the filing of the bill in and about the establishment of a smelting plant, and within thirty days after the accounting is completed to pay to the Ford Motor Company, in pursuance of the obligation of the undertaking executed by them, the amount by such accounting found and determined to have been in fact paid out in and about the work aforesaid, and to discharge all liabilities incurred in that behalf, taking from the Ford Motor Company conveyance and transfer of any and all property purchased and acquired in the establishment of said plant. Dates are fixed for the payment of the special dividend ordered to be made, and plaintiffs are awarded their costs.

It should be stated that as to the defendants, James Couzens and David Gray, the bill of complaint was taken as confessed.

The limited dividend ordered is fixed with reference to the written demand of plaintiffs for the distribution of 50 per cent of the cash.

Defendants have appealed, plaintiffs have not appealed, from the decree. In the briefs, appellants state and discuss the following propositions:

"(1) The claim of plaintiffs' counsel that a manufacturing corporation in Michigan may not have more than $25,000,000 (now $50,000,000) of capital assets, is without merit.

"(2) Monopoly. There is nothing in the Anti-trust Laws which affects this case. Mere bigness of a corporation is not unlawful.

"(3) It is lawful for the Ford Motor Company to build blast furnaces at the Rouge.

"(a) No claim in this regard is made by plaintiffs in the bill of complaint.

"(b) The plaintiffs are estopped by their conduct to raise the question.

"(c) The work is not ultra vires the corporation.

"(4) The management of the corporation and its affairs rests in the board of directors, and no court will interfere or substitute its judgment so long as the proposed actions are not ultra vires or fraudulent. They may be ill advised, in the opinion of the court, but this is no ground for exercise of jurisdiction.

"(5) The board has full power over the matter of investing the surplus and as to dividends, so long as they act in good faith.

"(6) Such rights of management and control over investments and dividends are not only rules of law, they are rights fixed by the contract between the parties in the formation of the corporation.

"(7) These things are so, although the majority of the stock is held by one man.

"It is the right and the duty of the majority to control. This duty must be exercised, and the responsibility cannot be shifted or evaded.

"(8) Motives of the board members are not material and will not be inquired into by the court, so long as the acts are within their lawful powers.

"(9) Motives of a humanitarian character will not invalidate or form the basis of any relief so long as the acts are within the lawful powers of the board, if believed to be for the permanent welfare of the company.

"(10) The court will not entertain a bill to enforce unconscionable demands, no matter what the legal rights of plaintiffs may be."

In the brief for plaintiffs, the grounds for relief are stated as follows:

"(1) The proposed scheme of expansion is not for the financial advantage of the corporation, either mediate or immediate, and is not to be prosecuted with that intent, but for the purpose of increasing the number of employees and of the cars produced, to the end of giving employment and low-priced cars to a greater number of people.

"(These are ends worthy in themselves but not within the scope of an ordinary business corporation—ends which, if prosecuted, should be by individuals associated for such purposes).

"(2) If the proposed scheme of expansion were for the proper and legitimate uses and needs of the corporation, and a cash surplus equivalent to that accumulated and now on hand were necessary for the business of the corporation, nevertheless, a proper dividend ought to be required to be declared and paid out of such accumulated cash surplus, because the only reason there would not be ample cash on hand for all purposes, including proper dividends, is that the price of the cars, and of the parts therefor, has been arbitrarily fixed at a figure which it is intended shall not produce a net profit sufficient to fulfil all those requirements, including the payment of proper dividends, and the requiring of the payment of dividends will force, and it is the only way by which can be forced, the fixing of prices which will produce the requisite amount of net profits.

"(The whole scheme is to bring about such a relation of wages, revenue, and cash requirements of the business as to preclude dividends of a reasonable return upon the fair value of the capital stock.)

"(3) The relation, irrespective of any limitation imposed by statute, between the authorized capital stock of the Ford Motor Company, $2,000,000, and the accumulated surplus (outside of cash on hand and municipal bonds in which some of the same has been temporarily invested), $58,000,000, is such as in and of itself requires the prevention of the further conversion of accumulated cash surplus from current earnings into capital investment against the objection of any stockholder.

"(4) A smelting plant for the manufacture from the ore of iron for use in the manufacture of automobiles is not within the power of a corporation organized under Act 232 of the Public Acts of 1903.

"(5) The capital stock of a corporation organized under Act 232 of the Public Acts of 1903 is limited to $25,000,000, and as defendant corporation has now, as shown by the financial statement, an actual capital investment (outside of cash on hand and municipal bonds in which some of the same has been temporarily invested) of $60,000,000, the conversion of the accumulated cash surplus from current earnings into capital investment by the enlargement of the plant and facilities for the manufacture and sale of automobiles is within the inhibition of the statutory limitation."

Messrs. Lucking, Helfman, Lucking, & Hanlon, Alexis C. Angell, L. B. Robertson, H. H. Rackham, and Hubert B. Hartman, for appellants:

A limitation upon the amount of capital stock is in no sense a limitation upon the amount of property.

Ostrander, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The authorized capital stock of the defendant company is $2,000,000. Its capital, in July, 1916, invested in some form of property, including accounts receivable, was $78,278,418.65, and, less liabilities other than capital stock, was more than $60,000,000. Besides this, it had and was using as capital nearly $54,000,000 in cash or the equivalent of cash. It is contended by plaintiffs that because the statute has prescribed that the total authorized capital stock shall be not less than $1,000, and not more than $25,000,000 (now $50,000,000), the capital of any corporation organized under the act may not lawfully exceed $25,000,000 (now $50,000,000). In the argument presented by them the term "capital" is used as meaning "the aggregate of the sums subscribed and paid in or secured to be paid in by the shareholders, with the addition of all gains or profits realized in the use and investment of those sums; or, if losses have been incurred, then it is the residue after deducting such losses."

Pointing out that the shares of stock are at all times representative of the capital, whatever it may be, it is said that the learned trial judge decided that "it was the legislative intent to prohibit a corporation having a capital in excess of the maximum limitation, whether that excess was acquired by contributions from stockholders or from profits on those contributions."

And, in the judgment of counsel for plaintiffs, the essence of the reasoning employed by the trial judge may be and is stated by them in this language: "Looking at the statute, the history of the times, and the constitutional provision respecting corporations, it appears that the limitation in question was put in the statute because it was believed that mischief would result unless a restriction was placed upon corporate capital; that it was the intent of the statute to prevent this mischief; that to permit corporations to increase their capital, at pleasure, from undivided profits, would frustrate that intent and give to old corporations powers, rights, and privileges which were not given to new corporations, and thus make corporations unequal before the law, contrary to the intent of the provision in our Constitution respecting corporations, to place them all on a basis of equality."

It was the opinion of the three judges to whom was presented the application for a temporary restraining order that the statute, in the language referred to, does not limit the amount of capital—that portion of the assets of a corporation, regardless of their source, utilized for the conduct of the corporate business for the purpose of deriving gains and profits—which a corporation organized under the act may lawfully possess.

The term, "capital stock," in its primary sense, means the fund, property, or other means contributed or agreed to be contributed by shareholders as the financial basis for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, being made directly through stock subscriptions or indirectly through the declaration of stock dividends. The capital stock of a corporation is always representative of the net assets of the corporation, whatever they may be, and so a share of stock may be worth more or less than its par value, because it is representative of an aliquot part of the net assets of the corporation. The section of the statute with which we are dealing relates to the organization of corporations, and, plainly, it is the legislative intent that no more than $50,000,000 of capital shall be, in the first instance, aggregated and embarked in business under this law. It has been the policy of the state, unlike that of most of the states, to limit the aggregate of capital which, in the first instance, may be employed in corporate enterprises; but the history of legislation is not evidence of a continuing state policy which limits the capital assets of corporations. Act No. 41, Public Acts of 1853, authorized the formation of manufacturing corporations. It contained the provision: "The amount of the capital stock in every such corporation shall be fixed and limited by the stockholders in their articles of association, and shall, in no case, be less than ten thousand dollars, nor more than five hundred thousand dollars, and shall be divided into shares of twenty-five dollars each. The capital stock may be increased, and the number of shares, at any meeting of the stockholders called for that purpose: Provided, that the amount so increased shall not, with the existing capital, exceed five hundred thousand dollars."

In 1875, Act No. 89, this law was amended. As to corporations engaged in mining or manufacturing iron, steel, silver, lumber, or copper, the maximum limit of capital stock was fixed at $2,500,000, as to any other manufacturing corporation the limit was $500,000, and it was expressly subject to these limitations that the capital stock was permitted to be increased. At the same session, Act No. 187 was passed for the incorporation of manufacturing companies. The minimum limit of capital stock was fixed at $10,000, which might be increased by stockholders; the maximum limit being $2,500,000. In 1881, Act No. 257, the maximum was increased to $5,000,000. Act No. 232 of the Public Acts of 1885 was a revision of laws for incorporating manufacturing companies. By its terms the articles of incorporation were required to state the amount of capital stock, not less than $5,000 or more than $5,000,000, except that corporations for manufacturing cheese or other products of milk might have not less than $1,000 capital stock. The express terms are that, subject to these limitations, the capital stock may be increased or diminished, etc. In argument, significance is attached to the language employed in the Act of 1853, authorizing an increase of capital stock, but providing that the amount of the increase, "with the existing capital," shall not exceed the maximum of $500,000. Significance is also attached to the language in the amending acts, which permit an increase of capital stock subject to the limitations as to minimum and maximum of capital stock.

Assuming that the legislature, in passing the Law of 1853, had in view the distinction between capital stock and capital, or capital assets, and intended a maximum limitation of the amount of capital, the assumption must, of course, rest upon the language employed in the law. When the legislature in the later act omitted the words upon which the assumption is based, no reason is apparent for the conclusion that the limitation of capital was still intended. If the Act of 1853 contains evidence of a policy limiting capital assets, the Act of 1903 contains no such evidence.

There is no apparent reason for entering upon the task of interpreting or construing language which is self-interpreting, which has a clear, reasonable meaning. The same general implications are to be drawn from the phrase, "not more than," as from the phrase, "not less than." We are not called upon to find a reason for the policy of limiting the capital stock, or for the failure to also limit the value of the assets which may at any time be employed in the corporate business.

Statute—
interpretation—limitation of capital of corporation.

We may assume a legislative reason, but may not assume that, because a possible reason may be given for a further limitation, such further limitation must be implied.

The reasons given for a different interpretation of the language, reasons which introduce matter not in the statute, are inconclusive. If the claimed statute limitation exists, it is imperative. It is manifestly impracticable, if not impossible, to limit the use in its business by a corporation of any size, of its profits, to require that, when organized with the maximum amount of capital stock, all profits shall be set aside. It is conceded in argument that there must be some variation, some leeway. But, if any, how much? It may be supposed that the legislature looked with disfavor upon an initial aggregation of capital exceeding a certain amount. It cannot be supposed that it looked with disfavor upon a profitable corporate existence.

Subscriptions to capital stock may be paid for in property valued by those associating. It may be that a patent is contributed which, until exploited, has only an estimated potential value—no selling value—but, after exploitation, would sell for more than the maximum limit fixed for capital stock. No one would contend that a $50,000,000 manufacturing corporation could not borrow money for the purposes of its business. Of course, if it borrowed, it would owe for the money, and, as matter of bookkeeping, would not by borrowing expand its capital assets. But, in fact, at the expense of a small rate of interest, it might add $50,000,000 to the capital actually employed in business.

Experience would not lead to the belief that any manufacturing corporation of any size would continue to embark in the enterprise such profits as competition permitted, and stockholders were willing to forego, to the public detriment. It happens that the Ford Motor Company has had an unusual, a phenomenal, experience; but this affords no reason for finding the meaning in the statute which plaintiffs insist shall be given to it. That no limit is, in terms, placed upon the value of assets—capital—which may be employed, is a circumstance supporting the conclusion that none was intended.

Corporation—
statutory limitation of capital—
use of profits.

Any aggregation of capital, from $1,000 to $50,000,000, is now permitted, invited, to be embarked in business under this statute, the corporations formed to compete among themselves, and with foreign corporations admitted to do business in this state. The purpose of any organization under the law is earnings, profit. Undistributed profits belong to the corporation, and, so far as any limitation can be found in this act, may be lawfully employed as capital. If the meaning of the law were more doubtful, it would be prudent, if not imperative, that the legislature be left to make plain what is supposed to be obscure.

There is little, if anything, in the bill of complaint which suggests the contention that the smelting of iron ore as a part of the process of manufacturing motors is, or will be, an activity ultra vires the defendant corporation. On the contrary, the bill charges that the erection of smelters and such other buildings, machinery, and appliances as are intended to go along with the business of smelting ore, is part of a general plan of expansion of the business of defendant corporation which is in itself unwise, and which is put into operation for the purpose of absorbing profits which ought to be distributed to shareholders. Restraint is asked, not because the smelting business is ultra vires the corporation, but because the whole plan of expansion is inimical to shareholders' rights, and was formulated and will be carried out in defiance of those rights.

The gray iron parts of a Ford car weigh, in the rough, 268.90 pounds, and when finished 215.71 pounds. This iron, as now made by defendants, costs per car, at the prices of iron when the cause was tried, $11.184. The malleable iron parts weigh, finished, per car, 69.63 pounds, and would cost $6.757. The total cost per car of gray and malleable iron parts is less than $18.

The smelter proposition involves, of course, much more than the initial expenditure for a plant. It involves the use of a large amount of capital to secure the finished product for the cars. Quantities of iron ore must be purchased and carried in stock; coal for the coke ovens must be purchased; the plant must be maintained. If the plant produces the necessary iron, and 800,000 cars are made in a year, something more than 270,000,000 pounds of iron ore will be produced, and if, as is claimed by Mr. Ford, the cost is reduced to the company by one half, and better iron made, a saving of $9 or $10 on the cost of each car will be the result. Presumably, this saving will also be reflected in the profits made from sales of parts. Ultimately, the result will be, either a considerable additional profit upon each car sold, or it will permit a reduction in the selling price of cars and parts. The process proposed to be used has not been used commercially.

The contention that the project is ultra vires the defendant corporation appears to have been made upon the application for a preliminary restraining order, and at the hearing on the merits, as a reason for denying the right to invest instead of distributing the money which the proposed plant will cost, with no claim of surprise upon the part of defendants.

Strictly, upon the pleadings, the question of ultra vires is not for decision, and this is not seriously denied. Assuming, however, in view of the course taken at the hearing, it is proper to express an opinion upon the point, it must be said that to make castings from iron ore, rather than to make them from pig iron, as defendant is now doing, eliminating one usual process, is not beyond the power of the corporation. In its relation to the <sup>—ultra vires—operation of smelter.</sup> finished product, iron ore, an article of commerce, is not very different from lumber. It is admitted that the defendant company may not undertake to smelt ore except for its own uses. Defendant corporation is organized to manufacture motors and automobiles and their parts. To manufacture implies the use of means of manufacturing as well as the material. No good reason is perceived for saying that, as matter of power, it may not manufacture all of an automobile. In doing so, it need not rely upon the statute grant of incidental powers. Extreme cases may be put; as, for example, if it may make castings from iron ore, may it invest in mines which produce the ore, and in means for transporting the ore from mine to factory? Or, if it may make the rubber tires for cars, may it own and exploit a rubber plantation in Brazil, or elsewhere? No such case is presented, and, until presented, need not be considered.

As we regard the testimony as failing to prove any violation of Anti-trust Laws, or that the alleged Monopoly— policy of the com-extension of pany, if success-corporation. fully carried out, will involve a monopoly other than such as accrues to a concern which makes what the public demands, and sells it at a price which the public regards as cheap or reasonable, the case for plaintiffs must rest upon the claim, and the proof in support of it, that the proposed expansion of the business of the corporation, involving the further use of profits as capital, ought to be enjoined because inimical to the best interests of the company and its shareholders, and upon the further claim that in any event the withholding of the special dividend asked for by plaintiffs is arbitrary action of the directors, requiring judicial interference.

The rule which will govern courts in deciding these questions is not in dispute. It is, of course, differently phrased by judges and by authors, and, as the phrasing in a particular instance may seem to lean for or against the exercise of the right of judicial interference with the actions of corporate directors, the context, or the facts before the court, must be considered. This court, in Hunter v. Roberts, T. &
 Co. 83 Mich. 63, 71, 47 N. W. 184, recognized the rule in the following language: "It is a well-recognized principle of law that the directors of a corporation, and they alone, have the power to declare a dividend of the earnings of the corporation, and to determine its amount. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 725. Courts of equity will not interfere in the management of the directors, unless it is clearly made to appear that they are guilty of fraud or misappropriation of the corporate funds, or refuse to declare a dividend when the corporation has a surplus of net profits which it can, without detriment to its business, divide among its stockholders, and when a refusal to do so would amount to such an abuse of discretion as would constitute a fraud, or breach of that good faith which they are bound to exercise towards the stockholders."

In 2 Cook on Corporations, 7th
 ed. § 545, it is expressed as follows:

"The board of directors declare the dividends, and it is for the directors, and not the stockholders, to determine whether or not a dividend shall be declared.

"When, therefore, the directors have exercised this discretion and refused to declare a dividend, there will be no interference by the courts with their decision, unless they are guilty of a wilful abuse of their discretionary powers, or of bad faith, or of a neglect of duty. It requires a very strong case to induce a court of equity to order the directors to declare a dividend, in as much as equity has no jurisdiction unless fraud or a breach of trust is involved. There have been many attempts to sustain such a suit, yet, although the courts do not disclaim jurisdiction, they have quite uniformly refused to interfere. The discretion of the directors will not be interfered with by the courts, unless there has been bad faith, wilful neglect, or abuse of discretion.

"Accordingly, the directors may,
 in the fair exercise of their discretion, invest profits to extend and develop the business, and a reasonable use of the profits to provide additional facilities for the business cannot be objected to or enjoined by the stockholders."

In 1 Morawetz on Corporations, 2d ed. § 447, it is stated:

"Profits earned by a corporation may be divided among its shareholders, but it is not a violation of the charter if they are allowed to accumulate and remain invested in the company's business. The managing agents of a corporation are impliedly invested with a discretionary power with regard to the time and manner of distributing its profits. They may apply profits in payment of floating or funded debts, or in development of the company's business; and so long as they do not abuse their discretionary powers, or violate the company's charter, the courts cannot interfere.

"But it is clear that the agents of a corporation, and even the majority, cannot arbitrarily withhold profits earned by the company, or apply them to any use which is not authorized by the company's charter. The nominal capital of a company does not necessarily limit the scope of its operations; a corporation may borrow money for the purpose of enlarging its business, and in many instances it may use profits for the same purpose. But the amount of the capital contributed by the shareholders is an important element in determining the limit beyond which the company's business cannot be extended by the investment of profits. If a corporation is formed with a capital of $100,000 in order to carry on a certain business, no one would hesitate to say that it would be a departure from the intention of the founders to withhold the profits, in order to develop the company's business, until the sum of $500,000 had been amassed, unless the company was formed mainly for the purpose of accumulating the profits from year to year. The question in each case depends upon the use to which the capital is put, and the meaning of the company's charter. If a majority of the shareholders or the directors of a corporation wrongfully refuse to declare a dividend and distribute profits earned by the company, any shareholder feeling aggrieved may obtain relief in a court of equity.

"It may often be reasonable to withhold part of the earnings of a corporation in order to increase its surplus fund, when it would not be reasonable to withhold all the earnings for that purpose. The shareholders forming an ordinary business corporation expect to obtain the profits of their investment in the form of regular dividends. To withhold the entire profits merely to enlarge the capacity of the company's business would defeat their just expectations. After the business of a corporation has been brought to a prosperous condition, and necessary provision has been made for future prosperity, a reasonable share of the profits should be applied in the payment of regular dividends, though a part may be reserved to increase the surplus and enlarge the business itself."

One other statement may be given from Park v. Grant Locomotive Works, 40 N. J. Eq. 114, 3 Atl. 162 (45 N. J. Eq. 244, 19 Atl. 621): "In cases where the power of the directors of a corporation is without limitation, and free from restraint, they are at liberty to exercise a very liberal discretion as to what disposition shall be made of the gains of the business of the corporation. Their power over them is absolute, so long as they act in the exercise of their honest judgment. They may reserve of them whatever their judgment approves as necessary or judicious for repairs and improvements, and to meet contingencies, both present and prospective. And their determination in respect of these matters, if made in good faith and for honest ends, though the result may show that it was injudicious, is final, and not subject to judicial revision."

It is not necessary to multiply statements of the rule.

To develop the points now discussed, and to a considerable extent they may be developed together as a single point, it is necessary to refer with some particularity to the facts.

When plaintiffs made their complaint and demand for further dividends, the Ford Motor Company had concluded its most prosperous year of business. The demand for its cars at the price of the preceding year continued. It could make and could market in the year beginning August 1, 1916, more than 500,000 cars. Sales of parts and repairs would necessarily increase. The cost of materials was likely to advance, and perhaps the price of labor; but it reasonably might have expected a profit for the year of upwards of $60,000,000. It had assets of more than $132,000,000, a surplus of almost $112,000,000, and its cash on hand and municipal bonds were nearly $54,000,000. Its total liabilities, including capital stock, was a little over $20,000,000. It had declared no special dividend during the business year except the October, 1915, dividend. It had been the practice, under similar circumstances, to declare larger dividends. Considering only these facts, a refusal to declare and pay further dividends appears to be not an exercise of discretion on the part of the directors, but an arbitrary refusal to do what the circumstances required to be done. These facts and others call upon the directors to justify their action, or failure or refusal to act. In justification, the defendants have offered testimony tending to prove, and which does prove, the following facts: It had been the policy of the corporation for a considerable time to annually reduce the selling price of cars, while keeping up, or improving, their quality. As early as in June, 1915, a general plan for the expansion of the productive capacity of the concern by a practical duplication of its plant had been talked over by the executive officers and directors, and agreed upon; not all of the details having been settled, and no formal action of directors having been taken. The erection of a smelter was considered, and engineering and other data in connection therewith secured. In consequence, it was determined not to reduce the selling price of cars for the year beginning August 1, 1915, but to maintain the price, and to accumulate a large surplus to pay for the proposed expansion of plant and equipment, and perhaps to build a plant for smelting ore. It is hoped by Mr. Ford that eventually 1,000,000 cars will be annually produced. The contemplated changes will permit the increased output.

The plan, as affecting the profits of the business for the year beginning August 1, 1916, and thereafter, calls for a reduction in the selling price of the cars. It is true that this price might be at any time increased, but the plan called for the reduction in price of $80 a car. The capacity of the plant, without the additions thereto voted to be made (without a part of them, at least), would produce more than 600,000 cars annually. This number, and more, could have been sold for $440 instead of $360, a difference in the return for capital, labor, and materials employed of at least $48,000,000. In short, the plan does not call for and is not intended to produce immediately a more profitable business, but a less profitable one; not only less profitable than formerly, but less profitable than it is admitted it might be made. The apparent immediate effect will be to diminish the value of shares and the returns to shareholders.

It is the contention of plaintiffs that the apparent effect of the plan is intended to be the continued and continuing effect of it, and that it is deliberately proposed, not of record and not by official corporate declaration, but nevertheless proposed, to continue the corporation henceforth as a semi-eleemosynary institution, and not as a business institution. In support of this contention, they point to the attitude and to the expressions of Mr. Henry Ford.

Mr. Henry Ford is the dominant force in the business of the Ford Motor Company. No plan of operations could be adopted unless he consented, and no board of directors can be elected whom he does not favor. One of the directors of the company has no stock. One share was assigned to him to qualify him for the position, but it is not claimed that he owns it. A business, one of the largest in the world, and one of the most profitable, has been built up. It employs many men, at good pay.

"My ambition," said Mr. Ford, "is to employ still more men, to spread the benefits of this industrial system to the greatest possible number, to help them build up their lives and their homes. To do this we are putting the greatest share of our profits back in the business."

"With regard to dividends, the company paid 60 per cent on its capitalization of $2,000,000, or $1,200,000, leaving $58,000,000 to reinvest for the growth of the company. This is Mr. Ford's policy at present, and it is understood that the other stockholders cheerfully accede to this plan."

He had made up his mind in the summer of 1916 that no dividends other than the regular dividends should be paid, "for the present."

Q. For how long? Had you fixed in your mind any time in the future, when you were going to pay—

A. No.

Q. That was indefinite in the future?

A. That was indefinite; yes, sir.

The record, and especially the testimony of Mr. Ford, convinces that he has to some extent the attitude towards shareholders of one who has dispensed and distributed to them large gains, and that they should be content to take what he chooses to give. His testimony creates the impression also, that he thinks the Ford Motor Company has made too much money, has had too large profits, and that, although large profits might be still earned, a sharing of them with the public, by reducing the price of the output of the company, ought to be undertaken. We have no doubt that certain sentiments, philanthropic and altruistic, creditable to Mr. Ford, had large influence in determining the policy to be pursued by the Ford Motor Company—the policy which has been herein referred to.

It is said by his counsel that "although a manufacturing corporation cannot engage in humanitarian works as its principal business, the fact that it is organized for profit does not prevent the existence of implied powers to carry on with humanitarian motives such charitable works as are incidental to the main business of the corporation."

And again: "As the expenditures complained of are being made in an expansion of the business which the company is organized to carry on, and for purposes within the powers of the corporation as hereinbefore shown, the question is as to whether such expenditures are rendered illegal because influenced to some extent by humanitarian motives and purposes on the part of the members of the board of directors."

In discussing this proposition, counsel have referred to decisions such as Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827; Taunton v. Royal Ins. Co. 2 Hem. & M. 135, 71 Eng. Reprint, 413, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 406, 10 Jur. N. S. 291, 10 L. T. N. S. 156, 12 Week. Rep. 549; Henderson v. Bank of Australia, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 170, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 197, 59 L. T. N. S. 856, 37 Week. Rep. 332; Steinway v. Steinway & Sons, 17 Misc. 43, 40 N. Y. Supp. 718; People ex rel. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Hotchkiss, 136 App. Div. 150, 120 N. Y. Supp. 649. These cases, after all, like all others in which the subject is treated, turn finally upon the point, the question, whether it appears that the directors were not acting for the best interests of the corporation. We do not draw in question, nor do counsel for the plaintiffs do so, the validity of the general proposition stated by counsel, nor the soundness of the opinions delivered in the cases cited. The case presented here is not like any of them. The difference between an incidental humanitarian expenditure of corporate funds for the benefit of the employees, like the building of a hospital for their use and the employment of agencies for the betterment of their condition, and a general purpose and plan to benefit mankind at the expense of others, is obvious. There should be no confusion (of which there is evidence) of the duties which Mr. Ford conceives that he and the stockholders owe to the general public, and the duties which in law he and his codirectors owe to protesting, minority stockholders. A business corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders. The powers of the directors are to be employed for that end. The discretion of directors is to be exercised in the choice of means to attain that end, and does not extend to a change in the end itself, to the reduction of profits, or to the nondistribution of profits among stockholders in order to devote them to other purposes.

There is committed to the discretion of directors, a discretion to be exercised in good faith, the infinite details of business, including the wages which shall be paid to employees, the number of hours they shall work, the conditions under which labor shall be carried on, and the price for which products shall be offered to the public.

It is said by appellants that the motives of the board members are not material, and will not be inquired into by the court so long as their acts are within their lawful powers. As we have pointed out, and the proposition does not require argument to sustain it, it is not within the lawful powers of a board of directors to shape and conduct the affairs of a corporation for the merely incidental benefit of shareholders, and for the primary purpose of benefiting others, and no one will contend that, if the avowed purpose of the defendant directors was to sacrifice the interests of shareholders, it would not be the duty of the courts to interfere.

We are not, however, persuaded that we should interfere with the proposed expansion of the business of the Ford Motor Company. In view of the fact that the selling price of products may be increased at any time, the ultimate results of the larger business cannot be certainly estimated. The judges are not business experts. It is recognized that plans must often be made for a long future, for expected competition, for a continuing as well as an immediately profitable venture. The experience of the Ford Motor Company is evidence of capable management of its affairs. It may be noticed, incidentally, that it took from the public the money required for the execution of its plan, and that the very considerable salaries paid to Mr. Ford and to certain executive officers and employees were not diminished. We are not satisfied that the alleged motives of the directors, in so far as they are reflected in the conduct of the business, menace the interests of shareholders. It is enough to say, perhaps, that the court of equity is at all times open to complaining shareholders having a just grievance.

Assuming the general plan and policy of expansion and the details of it to have been sufficiently formally approved at the October and November, 1917, meetings of directors, and assuming further that the plan and policy and the details agreed upon were for the best ultimate interest of the company and therefore of its shareholders, what does it amount to in justification of a refusal to declare and pay a special dividend or dividends? The Ford Motor Company was able to estimate with nicety its income and profit. It could sell more cars than it could make. Having ascertained what it would cost to produce a car and to sell it, the profit upon each car depended upon the selling price. That being fixed, the yearly income and profit were determinable, and, within slight variations, were certain.

There was appropriated—voted—for the smelter $11,325,000. As to the remainder voted, there is no available way for determining how much had been paid before the action of directors was taken, and how much was paid thereafter; but assuming that the plans required an expenditure, sooner or later, of $9,- 895,000 for duplication of the plant, and for land and other expenditures $3,000,000, the total is $24,220,000. The company was continuing business at a profit—a cash business. If the total cost of proposed expenditures had been immediately withdrawn in cash from the cash surplus (money and bonds) on hand August 1, 1916, there would have remained nearly $30,000,000.

Defendants say, and it is true, that a considerable cash balance must be at all times carried by such a concern. But, as has been stated, there was a large daily, weekly, monthly, receipt of cash. The output was practically continuous, and was continuously, and within a few days, turned into cash. Moreover, the contemplated expenditures were not to be immediately made. The large sum appropriated for the smelter plant was payable over a considerable period of time. So that, without going further, it would appear that, accepting and approving the plan of the directors, it was their duty to distribute on or near the 1st of August, 1916, a very large sum of money to stockholders.

In reaching this conclusion, we do not ignore, but recognize, the validity of the proposition that plaintiffs have from the beginning profited by, if they have not lately officially participated in, the general policy of expansion pursued by this corporation. We do not lose sight of the fact that it had been, upon an occasion, agreeable to the plaintiffs to increase the capital stock to $100,000,000 by a stock dividend of $98,000,000. These things go only to answer other contentions now made by plaintiffs, and do not and cannot operate to estop them to demand proper dividends upon the stock they own. It is obvious that an annual dividend of 60 per cent upon $2,000,000, or $1,200,000, is the equivalent of a very small dividend upon $100,000,000, or more.

Appellants will tax the costs of their appeal, and two thirds of the amount thereof will be paid by plaintiffs. No other costs are allowed.

Moore, J.:

I agree with what is said by Justice Ostrander upon the subject of capitalization. I agree with what he says as to the smelting enterprise on the River Rouge. I do not agree with all that is said by him in his discussion of the question of dividends. I do agree with him in his conclusion that the accumulation of so large a surplus establishes the fact that there has been an arbitrary refusal to distribute funds that ought to have been distributed to the stockholders as dividends. I, therefore, agree with the conclusion reached by him upon that phase of the case.

ANNOTATION.

Right of business corporation to use its funds or property for humanitarian purposes.

The reported case (DODGE v. FORD MOTOR Co.) ante, 413, is of interest not only because of the element of the picturesque supplied by the history of the defendant company and the altruistic character of its moving spirit, but also because it brings into clear relief the principle, which earlier decisions had previously recognized, that the fundamental purpose of a business corporation is to earn as large a profit as trade conditions and the business sagacity of its management will permit, and that its property is but a trust fund, to be employed by its managers for that purpose. Their policies must be such as are conducive to such purpose; and if they wish to be generous they must employ their own funds, and not the funds of the corporation. "A business corporation," says the court in the reported case, "is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders. The powers of the directors are to be employed for that end. The discretion of directors is to be exercised in the choice of means to attain that end, and does not extend to a change in the end itself, to the reduction of profits, or to the nondistribution of profits among stockholders in order to devote them to other purposes."

"The directors [of a national bank] can use the funds and property of the bank only for proper banking purposes, and for the strict furtherance of the business objects and financial prosperity of the corporation. They cannot use any portion of the money for objects of usefulness, or charity, or the like, however worthy of encouragement or aid. They cannot make gifts from the corporate fund. All their transactions must be strictly matter of business." Morse, Banks & Bkg. § 127, cited with approval in McCrary v. Chambers (1892) 48 Ill. App. 445.

It is, however, within the powers of the officers or directors of a corporation to expend its funds for purposes which, although immediately charitable or humanitarian, have a tendency directly to promote the welfare of the corporation. The benefit reaped must, however, be an individual and personal benefit, and not a general benefit shared by the whole community.

As is said by Bowen, L. J., in Hutton v. West Cork R. Co. L. R. 23 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 654: "Charity has no business to sit at boards of directors qua charity." There is, however, a kind of charitable dealing which is for the interest of those who practise it, and to that extent, and in that garb (I admit not a very philanthropic garb), charity may sit at the board, but for no other purpose."

"If that act," said Beekman, J., in Steinway v. Steinway & Sons (1896) 17 Misc. 43, 404 N. Y. Supp. 718, "is one which is lawful in itself, and not otherwise prohibited, is done for the purpose of serving corporate ends, and is reasonably tributary to the promotion of those ends, in a substantial and not in a remote and fanciful sense, it may fairly be considered within charter powers. The field of corporate action in respect to the exercise of incidental powers is thus, I think, an expanding one. As industrial conditions change, business methods must change with them, and acts become permissible which, at an earlier period, would not have been considered to be within corporate power."

It is not beyond the corporate powers of a town site company to donate some of its lots to a university, to aid in the erection of a college building in the vicinity of the town site, if the effect of the construction of such building is to enhance the value of its remaining property. Whetstone v. Ottawa University (1874) 13 Kan. 320.

But it is not within the powers of the president of a corporation engaged in the manufacture of pumps and hydraulic machinery, to equip a laboratory of hydraulic engineering in a university, at the expense of the company; and it may be doubted whether the corporation itself would have power to do so. Worthington v. Worthington (1905) 100 App. Div. 332, 91 N. Y. Supp. 443.

The courts will not, at the instance of a stockholder, enjoin a water company, operating under a franchise granted by a municipal corporation, from furnishing water to such corporation for municipal purposes, free of charge, beyond what it was required to do, where it does not appear that in so doing the board of directors exceeded its discretion. Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) (1882) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827.

An insurance company will not be restrained, at the instance of a stockholder, from paying losses for which it is not legally liable, where it appears that it is the custom, among insurance companies generally, to pay losses of a similar character, the making of such payments being, under the circumstances, conducive to the well-being of the company. Taunton v. Royal Ins. Co. (1864) 2 Hen. & M. 135, 71 Eng. Reprint, 413, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 406, 10 L. T. N. S. 156, 12 Week. Rep. 549.

A street railway company may make a valid contract to furnish or pay for medical aid and attention to one injured upon its cars or tracks. Youngstown Park & F. Street R. Co. v. Kessler (1911) 84 Ohio St. 74, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 50, 95 N. E. 509, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 933.

It is within the powers of a manufacturing corporation which has removed its plant to a sparsely settled locality, to purchase land in excess of its own needs, to make expenditures for streets and sewers, and a water supply therefor, to erect houses to be sold or rented to its employees, and to make contributions toward the establishment of a church, school, free library, and free baths, such a policy on its part reasonably tending to insure the continued and faithful services of a skilled and contented body of operatives. Steinway v. Steinway & Sons (1896) 17 Misc. 43, 40 N. Y. Supp. 718.

In People ex rel. Metropolitan L. Ins.

Co. v. Hotchkiss (1909) 136 App. Div. 150, 120 N. Y. Supp. 649, it was held that a life insurance corporation, empowered by law to acquire and own such real estate "as shall be requisite for a convenient accommodation in the transaction of its business," may purchase land on which to erect a hospital for the care and treatment of its employees afflicted with tuberculosis. The court said: "The duties of the employer to the employee have been enlarged in recent years, and are not merely that of the purchaser of the employee's time and service for money. The enlightened spirit of the age, based upon the experience of the past, has thrown upon the employer other duties, which involve a proper regard for the comfort, health, safety, and well-being of the employee. A corporation may not only pay to its employee the actual wage agreed upon, but may extend to him the same humane and rational treatment which individuals practise under like circumstances. It must do this in order to get competent and effective service. We see corporations pensioning old and infirm employees, establishing benefits for the sick and disabled, permitting regular vacations with continuing pay, aiding in sickness, and doing many humane and praiseworthy acts which formerly might have been questioned as not fairly within the powers or duties of the corporation. These acts are not to be defended upon the ground of gratuity or charity, but they enter into the relation of the employer and employee, become, as it were, a part of the inducement for the employee to enter the employment and serve faithfully for the wage agreed upon, and become a part of the terms of employment. The considerate employer who treats his employees well is thus able to secure better service, and upon more satisfactory terms, than the unwilling, illiberal employer. A corporation with 13,280 employees is called upon to exercise great care in selecting and managing them, so as to receive the best service. Upon their loyalty and efficiency much of its success must depend. The employment, training, disciplining, and managing of such a force, and obtaining from it the best results, is an important part of the relator's business. It is well within the corporate power to assume, as it has done, the care and treatment of such of its employees as are afflicted with tuberculosis. And unless it is shown to be wasteful of the company's money and unproductive of beneficial results, the practice may stand as well within the scope of its business. The reasonable care of its employees, according to the enlightened sentiment of the age and community, is a duty resting upon it, and the proper discharge of that duty is merely transacting the business of the corporation. If it preserves the health, the efficiency, and safety of the other employees to segregate such as have tuberculosis, or are suspected of being so afflicted, the relator has the power so to do; it would seem unnecessary to discharge a trusted employee because he is so afflicted, when the company, by proper treatment, may again obtain the value of his services; by taking him from its offices at once it not only benefits the employee and makes his speedy recovery and return to work more probable, but protects its other employees. If we assume that the company has the legal right to care for and assume the treatment of its employees so afflicted, it must follow that it has the right to do this in the most economical and most effective manner. It would seem that to put the patient in a hospital where intelligent treatment and manner of living is prescribed by the experience of those familiar with the disease, would tend to shorten the time of his sickness, lessen the expense thereof to the company, and insure his more speedy return to duty. I think the company has the right to care for and treat its employees so afflicted, and may do this in the manner which promises the best result to the patient, and consequently to the company itself."

A coal company may contract for services of a physician in the treatment of its employees for injuries received while working in its mines.

It is within the powers of a sawmill corporation to employ a physician on a contract for a fixed salary, to attend its employees in case of sickness or accident. Jackson Lumber Co. v. Trammell (1917) — Ala. —, 74 So. 469. In the course of its opinion the court said: "Without laborers the corporation would be powerless to carry out the purposes of its creation. It is, therefore, necessarily interested in the welfare of its employees. Much depends upon their health and their contentment in the service, and to conserve their physical comfort tends to their efficiency, and the greater their efficiency the greater the profits to the defendant company. It could hardly be denied that a private corporation engaged in the manufacture of lumber could, if it saw fit, erect houses for the use of its employees, and surround them with such sanitary conditions as would tend to promote their general and physical welfare, even though its charter might contain no such provisions. These are matters which relate to what might be termed the 'internal management' of the corporation, with which, in the absence of fraud or unfair dealing, the courts as a rule do not interfere."

A railroad corporation may defray the expense of caring for an injured employee. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Rodrigues (1868) 47 Ill. 188, 95 Am. Dec. 484; *Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. A number of cases have expressly held that it is within the powers of a railway company to contribute to a fund for the payment of benefits to sick or injured employees. Harrison v. Alabama Midland R. Co. (1906) 144 Ala. 246, 40 So. 394, 6 Ann. Cas. 804; Bedford Belt R. Co. v. McDonald (1896) 17 Ind. App. 492, 60 Am. St. Rep. 172, 46 N. E. 1022; *Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. The right of a railroad company so to do is also impliedly recognized in a number of cases which it is needless to cite.

A railroad corporation has incidental power to contract with its own employees to pay them half wages during disability resulting from service accidents. McAdow v. Kansas City Western R. Co. (1915) 96 Kan. 423, L.R.A. 1917B, 1158, 151 Pac. 1113.

A corporation may properly defray the funeral expenses of an employee killed in its factory. Noll v. Archer-Pancoast Co. (1901) 60 App. Div. 414, 69 N. Y. Supp. 1007.

A manufacturing corporation may, against the protest of a stockholder, give gratuities to its workmen after an especially prosperous year. Hampson v. Price's Patent Candle Co. (1876) 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 437, 34 L. T. N. S. 711, 24 Week. Rep. 754.

It has been held that an insurance company cannot vote a retiring officer a pension, in consideration of services previously rendered. Beers v. New York L. Ins. Co. (1892) 66 Hun, 75, 20 N. Y. Supp. 788. In this case, however, it did not appear that there was a custom among insurance companies to grant such pensions, and it did appear that the pension was wholly undeserved.

But in Henderson v. Bank of Australasia (1888) L. R. 40 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 170, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 197, 59 L. T. N. S. 856, 37 Week. Rep. 332, it was held to be within the powers of a banking corporation to pay a pension to the family of a deceased officer, it appearing that it was the custom of other banks to grant such gratuities to the widows and families of their officers dying in their service, so that a failure to conform to such practice would tend to weaken the efficiency of the staff, and would, therefore, be injurious to the shareholders' interests.

The general authority confided to the directors to manage the concerns of a gas company will authorize the grant of a pension to an officer wishing to retire on account of ill health, and agreeing to abstain from transferring his services to any other company. Clarke v. Imperial Gaslight & Coke Co. (1842) 4 Barn. & Ad. 315, 110 Eng. Reprint, 473, 1 Nev. & M. 206, 2 L. J. K. B. N. S. 30.

In Normandy v. Ind. C. & Co. [1908] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 84, it was said by Kekewich, J.: "I entertain no doubt that it is within the powers of the executive of a trading company, unless expressly prohibited, to grant a pension to a retiring officer or servant, and to do that with or without any reasonable terms which may be bargained for or imposed."

The stockholders of a national bank may create a pension fund to be shared by officers and employees, the establishment of such a fund having a direct and reasonably necessary bearing upon the successful carrying out of the business of the corporation, upon the class of employees likely to be obtained, upon the character of the service likely to be rendered, and upon the length of such service and the loyalty of the employees. Heinz v. National Bank (1916) 150 C. C. A. 592, 237 Fed. 942.

But while a company carrying on business has power to expend a portion of its funds in gratuities to servants and directors, provided such grants are made for the purpose of advancing the interests of the company, it cannot do so where it has transferred its undertaking to another company and ceased to be a going concern. Hutton v. West Cork R. Co. (1883) L. R. 23 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 654, 52 L. J. N. S. 689, 49 L. T. N. S. 420, 31 Week. Rep. 827.

It may be of interest to the reader, in connection with the reported case, to know that it has been held that, while the managers of a corporation may not reduce the price of its product for the purpose of benefiting the public, they may do so, even to the extent of selling below cost, where there is a reasonable expectation that such course will result in ultimate profit.

Thus, the directors of a corporation will not be enjoined, at the instance of a minority stockholder, from selling its products at a loss, where it does not appear that such course is not calculated in the end to make money. Trimble v. American Sugar

Ref. Co. (1901) 61 N. J. Eq. 340, 48 Atl. 912.

And the courts will not aid a stockholder of a corporation in an attempt to prevent it from selling its products for less than cost, where it appears that the reduction in price was necessary, in order to enable it to meet competition. Re Pierson (1899) 44 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 671, affirming (1899) 28 Misc. 726, 59 N. Y. Supp. 1003. E. S. O.

If the legislature had extended the validating Act of June 14, 1917, to include such school districts which had previously been adjudged illegal by final judgment, then the act would have been unconstitutional. The legislature may not under any pretext annul, set aside, or impair the final judgments previously rendered by the courts of competent jurisdiction.

Duncan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 21, 1917, upon leave granted the people, upon the relation of Charles A. Lafferty and a number of others, filed an information in the nature of quo warranto in the circuit court of McLean county against appellants, Leslie J. Owen and others, requiring them to show by what right they claimed to hold the offices of president and members of the board of education of a certain pretended high school district No. 333, situated in McLean county. To the information appellants filed a plea sufficient to show that the necessary steps had been taken to organize said territory into a high school district under the Act of June 5, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 505), and that the election for the organization of said district occurred February 15, 1916, and that at an election under said act duly called and advertised they were duly elected as president and members of said board of education March 4, 1916. They further averred in their plea that by virtue of the validating Act of June 14, 1917 (Laws 1917, p. 744), they had levied and collected taxes, employed and paid teachers and janitors, rented a schoolhouse, and had caused to be conducted a high school in said district continuously since their election. Appellees replied to the plea, in substance, that this court on October 24, 1916, prior to the passage of the validating Act of 1917, upon appeal had affirmed a judgment of the circuit court of McLean county quashing the record of high school district No. 333 in a proceeding by common-law writ of certiorari, in which the relators herein, as taxpayers and owners of land in said school district, were petitioners, and Benjamin C. Moore, county superintendent, and others, were defendants; that the judgment in the certiorari proceeding constitutes a bar to the operation of the validating Act of 1917 upon district No. 333, and that the pendency of the certiorari proceeding in the circuit court, and the judgment therein, so invalidated appellants' election that the Act of 1917 would not operate to validate it. Appellants filed a rejoinder, setting forth the judgments of the circuit court and of this court in the certiorari case, and also the opinions of the circuit judge and of the supreme court in that case, and the opinion of the supreme court in the case of People ex rel. Kane v. Weis, 275 Ill. 581, 114 N. E. 331, alleged that the judgments of the circuit court and of this court in the certiorari case (Lafferty v. Moore, 275 Ill. 580, 114 N. E. 336) were based on the sole ground that the Act of June 5, 1911, was unconstitutional, and further alleged that those judgments were not final judgments or binding on appellants because they were not parties to the judgments, and that those judgments did not prevent the validating Act of 1917 from validating their election. Appellees demurred to appellants' rejoinder. Appellants moved to carry the demurrer back to appellees' replication. The trial court sustained appellees' demurrer to the rejoinder and overruled appellants' motion to carry the demurrer back. Appellants stood by their motion to carry back the demurrer and by their rejoinder, and moved the court in arrest of judgment. The trial court overruled appellants' motion in arrest of judgment and entered judgment of ouster, from which appellants have appealed.

The judgments of the circuit court and of this court in the certiorari proceedings are final judgments, which quashed the record of the high school district and held the proceedings absolutely void and of no effect. From and after the rendering of those judgments the pretended record showing the organization of said high school district was an absolute nullity, and they were just as effectual to destroy the right or pretension of the appellants to assert and hold their officers as a board of education as if they had been ousted in a quo warranto proceeding and the district declared void. At the time the certiorari proceedings were instituted there was no board or pretended board of education in existence to be ousted by a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto. The common-law writ of certiorari was the only remedy, at the time it was sued out, to test the validity of the district, as there was no remedy by appeal or otherwise, and quo warranto would not lie, as there were no officers or pretended officers at that time in the district against whom information could be filed. The board of education of district No. 333 elected after the certiorari proceeding had been begun were bound by the proceeding. When called on by the information in this case to show their authority for assuming to be such officers, it was incumbent upon them to show a right de jure to such officers. The showing in this record is that they were sity of establish-

elected under the provisions of a void act as a board of education of a high school district pretended to be organized by the same void act, and which had, by courts of competent jurisdiction, been declared as having no legal existence, and the pretended record thereof null and void.

The legislature has no right or power to annul, set aside, or impair the final judgments previously rendered by courts of competent jurisdiction.

Constitutional law—validating act declared void by court.

The legislature had no power to validate any proceeding to organize a high school district under the Act of June 5, 1911, after final judgment had been rendered by this court, before the Act of 1917 was passed, holding the organization of the district invalid, and it does not matter whether such final judgment was rendered in a proceeding by common-law writ of certiorari or in a proceeding in which an information is filed in the nature of a quo warranto. People ex rel. Robinson v. New York C. R. Co. 283 Ill. 334, 119 N. E. 299; People ex rel. Shriver v. Cowen, 283 Ill. 308, 119 N. E. 335. We have heretofore frequently held that the validating act did apply to all high school districts organized under said act, even where proceedings were pending in a lower court of competent jurisdiction to oust the high school board and to declare the organization of the district void, or where such cases were pending, on appeal or otherwise, in this court and final judgment had not been rendered. People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Stitt, 280 Ill. 553, 117 N. E. 784; People ex rel. Vautrin v. Madison, 280 Ill. 96, 117 N. E. 493; People ex rel. Cofoid v. New York C. R. Co. 282 Ill. 458, 118 N. E. 723.

As the judgment of this court in the certiorari proceeding aforesaid was a final judgment declaring the organization or pretended organization of district No. 333 void, the judgment of ouster in this case was the only proper and legal judgment that could have been rendered. It follows, as a matter of course, that the trial court did not err in refusing to allow appellants' motion to set aside its order granting leave to file the information and to dismiss this suit, as the court had before it the petition for certiorari and the judgments of the trial court and of this court in said certiorari proceeding in Lafferty v. Moore, supra, in addition to the allegations in the petition for leave to file the information, supported by affidavits.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore affirmed.

I. Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to treat those cases only in which it appears that the legislature has attempted to annul, modify, or impair a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and in which the decision is based on the distinction between the powers and duties of the legislative and judicial departments of the government. Cases involving remedial legislation, the grant by the legislature of the right to new trials or appeals, and the power to validate faulty judicial proceedings, are excluded.

II. General rule.

It is well settled that the legislature is without power to invade the province of the judiciary by setting aside, modifying, or impairing a final judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction.

West Virginia.—Arnold v. Kelley (1872) 5 W. Va. 446; Ex parte Low (1884) 24 W. Va. 620.

As was said in Gilman v. Tucker (1891) 128 N. Y. 190, 13 L.R.A. 804, 26 Am. St. Rep. 464, 28 N. E. 1040: "A judgment has here been rendered, and the rights flowing from it have passed beyond the legislative power, either directly or indirectly, to reach or destroy. After adjudication the fruits of the judgment become rights of property. These rights became vested by the action of the court, and were thereby placed beyond the reach of legislative power to affect."

The rule is based on the well-established principle of public law that the three great powers of government, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, should be preserved as distinct from and independent of each other. Thus, in Denny v. Mattoon (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 361, 79 Am. Dec. 784, wherein it appeared that the legislature had passed an act which in effect annulled the decree of a court in insolvency proceedings, the court, holding the statute to be ineffective in so far as a final judgment was concerned, stated the rule as follows: "It is the exclusive province of courts of justice to apply established principles to cases within their jurisdiction, and to enforce their decisions by rendering judgments and executing them by suitable process. The legislature have no power to interfere with this jurisdiction in such manner as to change the decision of cases pending before courts, or to impair or set aside their judgments, or take cases out of the settled course of judicial proceeding. It is on this principle that it has been held that the legislature have no power to grant a new trial or direct a rehearing of a cause which has been once judicially settled. The right to a review, or to try anew facts which have been determined by a verdict or decree, depends on fixed and well-settled principles, which it is the duty of the court to apply in the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion. These cannot be regulated or governed by legislative action. Taylor v. Place (1856) 4 R. I. 337; Lewis v. Webb (1825) 3 Me. 326; De Chastellux v. Fairchild (1850) 15 Pa. 18, 53 Am. Dec. 570. A fortiori, an action of the legislature cannot set aside or annul final judgments or decrees. This is the highest exercise of judicial authority. Lord Coke calls judgment and execution the 'fruit of the law.' To vest in the legislature the power to take them away, or to impair their effect on the rights of parties, would be to deprive the judiciary of its most essential prerogative. It could then no longer finally adjudicate and determine the rights of litigants. The will of the legislature would be substituted in the place of fixed rules and established principles, by which alone judicial tribunals can be governed. The power to correct errors and to revise and reverse judgments, which in the strictest sense of the word has always been deemed essentially judicial, would be transferred to the legislative branch of the government, even to the extent of controlling the final decrees of the tribunal of last resort. It is obvious that such an exercise of authority would lead to the entire destruction of the order and harmony of our system of government, and to a manifest infraction of one of its fundamental principles. Indeed it is difficult to see how the legislature could more palpably invade the judicial department and effectually usurp its functions, than to pass statutes which should operate to set aside or annul judgments of courts in their nature final, and which would otherwise be conclusive on the rights of parties. Upon this ground we are of the opinion that the Statute of 1860, chap. 78, cannot be held to extend to a case like the present, in which a judicial decree declaring the proceedings void had been entered at the time of the enactment of the law. If such was the intent of the legislature in passing the act, it cannot be carried into effect, because it would operate to annul or reverse a final judgment of this court, which had conclusively settled the rights of persons who are parties and privies to the present proceeding."

But it has been held that a judgment granting a certificate of naturalization, though in form a judgment, is not so in substance, and, where obtained in ex parte proceedings, will not bar Congress from passing an act providing for its cancellation on proof that it was obtained by fraud. Johannessen v. United States (1912) 225 U. S. 227, 56 L. ed. 1066, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 613, wherein the court, in answering the contention that the Act of June 29, 1906 (6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 987), authorized the impeachment of a pre-existing judgment of a co-ordinate court for fraud, consisting of the introduction of relevant perjured testimony, and was therefore unconstitutional as an exercise of judicial power by the legislature, said: "Sound reason, as we think, constrains us to deny to a certificate of naturalization, procured ex parte in the ordinary way, any conclusive effect as against the public. Such a certificate, including the 'judgment' upon which it is based, is in its essence an instrument granting political privileges, and open like other public grants to be revoked if and when it shall be found to have been unlawfully or fraudulently procured. It is in this respect closely analogous to a public grant of land

(Rev. Stat. § 2289, etc., Comp. Stat. 1916, § 4530, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 543), or of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend a new and useful invention (Rev. Stat. § 4883, etc., Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9427, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 11). . . . The contention that the Act of June 29, 1906, in authorizing the impeachment of certificates of naturalization theretofore issued for fraud, consisting of the introduction of perjured testimony, is unconstitutional as an exercise of judicial power by the legislative department, is in effect disposed of by what has been said. The act does not purport to deprive a litigant of the fruits of a successful controversy in the courts; for, as already shown, the proceedings for naturalization are not in any proper sense adversary proceedings, but are ex parte and conducted by the applicant for his own benefit. The act in effect provides for a new form of judicial review of a question that is in form, but not in substance, concluded by the previous record, and under conditions affording to the party whose rights are brought into question full opportunity to be heard. Retrospective acts of this character have often been held not to be an assumption by the legislative department of judicial powers."

A decision of the supreme court, quashing an order of removal made by a lower court in proceedings for the transfer of a pauper from one township to another, has been held not to be such a judgment as the legislature may not modify, but, like a reversal on a writ of error, leaves the parties where they began and, therefore, an act of the legislature providing for a retrial of the case is not unconstitutional. West Buffalo v. Walker Twp. (1848) 8 Pa. 177.

a. Civil judgment generally.

Where a court by its judgment declared that the proceeds of a life insurance policy were subject to the payment of the debts of the insured, a statute subsequently enacted, providing that the proceeds of life insurance policies should inure to the separate use of the widow, husband, or minor children independently of the rights of the creditors of the insured, was held to be unconstitutional in so far as it applied to judgments rendered prior to its passage, in Skinner v. Holt (1896) 9 S. D. 427, 62 Am. St. Rep. 878, 69 N. W. 595.

Likewise it has been held that, where a court has decided that certain public lands were the property of the counties in which they lay, an act of the legislature authorizing the issuance of patents to persons who settled on the land is unconstitutional. Milam County v. Bateman (1880) 54 Tex. 153.

In Taylor v. Place (1856) 4 R. L. 324, it was held that a vote of the legislature opening judgments and setting aside a verdict so that certain garnishees could amend their affidavits, on the ground that they had been erroneously made through mistake, was unconstitutional.

It has been held that, where a proceeding for the sale of land on execution was declared null and void by a court of competent jurisdiction, the legislature was without power to enact a statute providing that in such a case the plaintiff must pay within a certain time to the grantee or his assignee, the money paid on the sale, including cost and expenses of the defendant in defending the action. Gilman v. Tucker (1891) 128 N. Y. 190, 13 L.R.A. 304, 26 Am. St. Rep. 464, 28 N. E. 1040, wherein it was said: "The sole aim of the statute thus seems to be to effect a change of title, and wrest from one person the property which has been finally adjudged to be his, and vest it in another by mere force of the legislative will. No obligation to make the payments referred to existed at law and none was created by the act, but it simply declared that unless they are made, the defaulting party shall forfeit his property and it shall be transferred to another who has neither legal nor equitable claim to it. In effect it reverses the judgment and gives to one that which the court has deliberately adjudged to another."

Similarly, where a court has declared a bank to be insolvent and appointed a receiver to take charge of and wind up its affairs, the legislature has no power to compel by statute such a receiver to turn over the property and control of the bank to a bank examiner, as such a statute amounts to a legislative modification of a judgment. State ex rel. Howell v. Wildes (1911) 34 Nev. 94, 116 Pac. 595.

Where a guardian has been duly appointed by lawful order of court with power of sale under further order of court, it has been held that the legislature is without authority to invest the mother of the wards with power to sell their estate, as such an act would be a modification or annulment of the judgment of a court. Lincoln v. Alexander (1877) 52 Cal. 482, 28 Am. Rep. 639.

In Geneva v. People (1901) 98 Ill. App. 315, it was held that an act of the legislature, amending an act under which a judgment had been rendered ordering a mandamus to issue, compelling a city to pass an ordinance disconnecting territory, by making the action discretionary with the city council, could not affect the judgment, as the legislature was without power to modify a judgment lawfully rendered.

In United States v. Peters (1809) 5 Cranch (U. S.) 115, 3 L. ed. 53, it appeared that a decree in a United States court in admiralty proceedings awarded certain moneys to the libellants. Subsequently the state legislature passed an act requiring the governor of the state to demand the money so awarded for the use of the state, the motive for the passage of the act being that the Federal court was without jurisdiction in the case. Holding that the legislature was without power to annul or modify the judgment of a Federal court, Chief Justice Marshall said: "If the legislature of the several states may, at will, annul the judgments of the courts of the United States, and destroy the rights acquired under those judgments, the Constitution itself becomes a solemn mockery; and the nation is deprived of the means of enforcing its laws by the instrumentality of its own tribunals."

Likewise, where a court has declared that a will was not legally executed, the legislature is powerless to enact a law providing that wills executed in the manner of the one adjudged to be invalid by the court should be deemed to be validly executed. Greenough v. Greenough (1849) 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Snyder v. Bull (1851) 17 Pa. 54.

So, it has been held that after a decree of a court construing certain deeds made by a married woman, the legislature is without power to pass an act vacating and annulling the deeds and the decree construing them. Berrett v. Oliver (1835) 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 191.

In Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Railroad Commission (1908) 161 Fed. 925, reversed on other grounds in (1909) 95 C. C. A. 117, 170 Fed. 225, it was held that the legislature had no power to enact a statute providing that the fact that an injunction had been issued restraining the collection of certain rates should be no defense to an action by a shipper to recover a penalty provided for by the statute, when the prohibited rate was exacted, as this in effect was nullifying a judgment of the court, which the legislature was powerless to do.

It has been held that, where a court had entered a decree in a creditors' suit against certain stockholders for their unpaid subscriptions, the legislature was without power to require that all actions for unpaid stock subscriptions should be brought in the courts of law, in so far as it was sought to make the act apply to suits in equity brought before the passage of the act. And it was further held that the fact that the cause was pending on appeal did not change the nature of the decree as a final judgment. Martin v. South Salem Land Co. (1896) 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 591.

In Arnold v. Kelley (1872) 5 W. Va. 446, it appeared that a judgment had been obtained for the conversion of property of another during the Civil War. Subsequently to the rendition of the judgment the legislature passed an act prohibiting the collection of any debt or judgment against any person who had done or committed any acts on either side in the late war, in accordance with the rules of civilized warfare. In holding the act to be unconstitutional the court said: "The legislature has no power to set aside a judgment, or to empower a court to set aside a judgment, rendered before the passage of the act, no matter how erroneous the judgment may be."

In Griffin v. Cunningham (1870) 20 Gratt. (Va.) 31, it was held that an act empowering the supreme court to review and set aside or affirm the judgments of a former court composed of judges holding office under military appointment was unconstitutional.

In McCullough v. Virginia (1898) 172 U. S. 102, 44 L. ed. 382, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 134, the court, holding that the repeal of an act providing a remedy by which holders of coupons cut from certain state bonds might force their acceptance in payment of taxes did not affect the validity of a judgment obtained under the act repealed, said: "It is not within the power of a legislature to take away rights which have been once vested by a judgment. Legislation may act on subsequent proceedings, may abate actions pending, but when those actions have passed into judgment the power of the legislature to disturb the rights created thereby ceases. So, properly, the court of appeals, in considering the question of the validity of this judgment, took no notice of the subsequent repeal of the act under which the judgment was obtained, and the inquiry in this court is not what effect the repealing Act of 1894 had upon proceedings initiated thereafter, or pending at the time, but whether such a repeal devastated a plaintiff in a judgment of the rights acquired by that judgment. And in that respect we have no doubt that the rights acquired by the judgment under the Act of 1882 were not disturbed by a subsequent repeal of the statute."

It has been held that the legislature has no power to validate the organization of a high school district after a judgment by the supreme court holding its organization to be invalid. People ex rel. Robinson v. New York C. R. Co. (1918) 283 Ill. 334, 119 N. E. 299. To the same effect, see the reported case (PEOPLE EX REL. LAFFERTY v. OWEN, ante, 447). But where the judgment declaring the organization invalid has not been passed on by the supreme court though it was pending in that court on appeal, the legislature may enact a law declaring the organization to be valid. People ex rel. Vautrin v. Madison (1917) 280 Ill. 96, 117 N. E. 493; People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Stitt (1917) 280 Ill. 553, 117 N. E. 784. However, where no appeal is pending from such a judgment, the legislature has no power to pass a statute declaring a high school district to be valid. People ex rel. Shriver v. Cowen (1918) 288 Ill. 308, 119 N. E. 335.

In People v. Keenan (1905) 110 App. Div. 537, 97 N. Y. Supp. 77, affirmed in (1906) 185 N. Y. 600, 78 N. E. 1108, it was insisted that an act of the legislature, requiring the chamberlain of the city of New York to pay over to the state treasurer all moneys paid into court and remaining unclaimed for a period of twenty years, was unconstitutional in that it attempted to modify or annul a judgment of the court. Holding the act to be valid, the court said: "The order or decree applies with the same force to the successor in office or other custodian of the fund as it did to the person who held the office when the order was granted and the deposit made. If a change in the occupant of the office worked a change in the order or decree under which the money was held, it would follow that the present chamberlain has no authority over the moneys which have come to him from the treasurers of the counties of Kings, Queens, and Richmond, or even from his predecessors in office, as the orders and decrees under which he now holds the moneys which are in controversy were made long prior to his incumbency. Each depositary takes the fund subject to the order or decree directing its deposit, and he becomes bound to execute the trust thereby committed to his care, in conformity with the terms of the order under which he holds it and under which it was originally deposited. The act in question does not seek to change the order or decree under which the deposit was made. The treasurer of the state of New York becomes bound by the very terms of the act to pay it out only under an order of the court to be hereafter made. The legislature by various enactments has changed the depository of court funds, and so far as we are aware, it has never before been urged that such a change tended to divest the property rights of the beneficiaries, or to nullify or interfere with the prior orders of the court."

In Schneck v. Jeffersonville (1898) 152 Ind. 204, 52 N. E. 212, it was held that a statute validating the bonds of a city which had theretofore been declared invalid by the courts was not unconstitutional with respect to an action involving the validity of such bonds, brought after the passage of the statute.

Where a court of competent jurisdiction has declared the levy of a special assessment to be void, and enjoined its collection, the legislature is without power to enact a law validating the assessment and in effect dissolving the injunction. Searcy v. Patriot & B. Turnp. Co. (1881) 79 Ind. 274; Baltimore v. Horn (1867) 26 Md. 194. In the case last cited it was said: "The most prominent objection to this law, taken in the argument by the counsel of the appellees, was that the legislature, in passing it, exercised judicial power, which, by the Declaration of Rights and numerous decisions in this state and other states of the Union, which separate the judicial from the legislative and executive powers of government, it could not assume and exercise. And this position, we think, is well taken. When this law was passed, the rights of the parties under the laws of 1856, chap. 164, had been judicially determined by this court. In the case of Balti- more v. Porter (1861) 18 Md. 284, 79 Am. Dec. 686, this court had adjudged that the parties assessed in certain proceedings under that law were not liable for the assessments, and had perpetually enjoined the city authorities from proceeding to collect them; and yet the Laws of 1864, chap. 344, passed after that decision, expressly authorized those authorities to proceed and collect them. It adjudged those parties to pay that which this court, in a regular proceeding, determined they were not bound to pay. It in effect, and that most plainly, reversed the judgment of this court. That which this court said was illegally done, or done without authority of law, or in contravention of law, and that the parties could not be assessed for, this act of assembly clearly declares shall be paid for by the parties, although they were relieved from that payment by the final determination of this court. There certainly could not be a more plain assumption of judicial power by the legislature than was exercised by the enactment of the Laws of 1864, chap. 344, and, as such, this law must be pronounced inoperative and void."

Likewise it has been held that where the supreme court had declared a tax levy to be invalid, its judgment could not be set aside by the legislature's passing an act declaring the levy valid. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. People (1906) 219 Ill. 408, 76 N. E. 571. And it was further held in that case that the fact that the act was passed before the judgment of the supreme court reversing and remanding the case had reached the lower court could not render it effectual as against the judgment.

Similarly, it has been held that where the courts had enjoined the levy of a drainage assessment the legislature had no authority to pass an act directing the county supervisors to reassess the tax and proceed to collect it, as this virtually amounted to the legislature setting aside a judgment of the court. People ex rel. Butler v. Saginaw County (1872) 26 Mich. 22.

In Moser v. White (1874) 29 Mich. 59, the court, in holding that the legislature could not, by legalizing an invalid tax roll, set aside or impair a judgment against the collectors for trespass in attempting to collect the tax, said: "That act does, in terms, purport to heal all the defects which have been pointed out. But plaintiff's judgment was obtained before the justice before this act was passed. If regular when obtained, it could not be reversed. The legislature have no authority to reverse judgments, directly or indirectly. The effect of the act must be so limited as not to interfere with an existing judgment, or it would be necessary to declare it void on principles which are too elementary to be discussed. The case had been already tried, and there was to be no further trial to determine the merits. The judgment had fixed the questions of fact, and the only matter open in the circuit was whether, in so doing, any legal error had been committed. To allow such a judgment to be vacated when there had been no error committed would be a plain invasion of private right, and a usurpation of judicial power which cannot be justified."

In Ex parte Low (1884) 24 W. Va. 620, it was held that an act authorizing and directing the assessors and clerks, in making out the land books for taxation, to disregard all changes made by the county court in the value of any tract of land under certain circumstances, was void as being an encroachment on the judiciary.

In Lambertson v. Hogan (1845) 2 Pa. St. 22, it was held that where a court of competent jurisdiction had decided that a purchaser of land at a tax sale, who had notice by ancient improvements that the land was seated, was not entitled to recover for improvements made by himself, the judgment could not be affected by an act of the legislature allowing compensation for improvements made bona fide under a tax title.

But in Re Lockett (1908) 58 Misc. 5, 110 N. Y. Supp. 32, the court, holding that an order of the court apportioning a tax assessment for street improvements was not such a judgment as the legislature could not modify, said: "It is true that the final order in the proceedings referred to has all the force and effect of a judgment, and that, ordinarily, the legislature cannot undo a judgment or deprive the successful party of its fruits. But the final order herein is of dual nature. So far as it divests the title to real estate by virtue of the right of eminent domain and fixes the compensation of the owner, the court acts judicially as in a controversy between private parties; but, so far as it apportions and imposes an assessment, it acts as but a legislative agency in the exercise of the taxing power. A tax levy made by public officers, if regular in form and within their jurisdiction, has as much the power and force of a judgment as if made by the confirmatory order of a court. The inviolability of these assessments depends in no way upon the form of the machinery by which the legislature had directed their levy originally. The whole question of taxation, within defined limits, is with the legislature. What it can take, it may remit, under many circumstances. What it has prescribed, it may change."

c. Criminal judgment.

The legislature has no power to pass an act reducing for good behavior the sentences of prisoners convicted before the passage of the act. Ex parte Darling (1881) 16 Nev. 98, 40 Am. Rep. 495; Ex parte Woodburn (1909) 32 Nev. 136, 104 Pac. 245; Com. ex rel. Johnson v. Halloway (1862) 42 Pa. 446, 82 Am. Dec. 526. In the case last cited, it was said: "The whole judicial power of the commonwealth is vested in courts. Not a fragment of it belongs to the legislature. The trial, conviction, and sentencing of criminals are judicial duties, and the duration or period of the sentence is an essential part of a judicial judgment in a criminal record. Can it be reversed or modified by a board of prison inspectors, acting under legislative authority? If it can, what judicial decree is not exposed to legislative modifications? From what judicial sentence may not the legislature direct 'deductions' to be made, if this act be constitutional? . What they may do indirectly they may do directly. If they may authorize boards of inspectors to disregard judicial sentences, why may they not repeal them as fast as they are pronounced, and thus assume the highest judicial functions?"

In People v. Cummings (1891) 88 Mich. 249, 14 L.R.A. 285, 50 N. W. 310, it was held that an act empowering prison commissioners to release prisoners on parole was an impairment of a judgment of court, and was therefore unconstitutional.

It has been held that an act of the legislature discharging a debtor from imprisonment on execution is unconstitutional, as invading the province of the judiciary. Ward v. Barnard (1825) 1 Aik. (Vt.) 121; Keith v. Ware (1829) 2 Vt. 174; Lyman v. Mower (1830) 2 Vt. 517; Kendall v. Dodge (1830) 3 Vt. 360.

But in the case of Re Nichols (1864) 8 R. I. 50, it was held that a special act of the legislature, permitting a person imprisoned for debt to take the poor debtor's oath and thereby relieve himself from liability, was not an unlawful invasion of the judicial power.

In Mason v. Haile (1827) 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 370, 6 L. ed. 660, it was held that a special act reviving an act for the relief of insolvent debtors for the benefit of a person imprisoned for debt was not unconstitutional.

In United States v. Klein (1872) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 128, 20 L. ed. 519, it was held that Congress had no power to pass an act denying to pardons granted by the President, the effect which the court of claims and the supreme court had adjudged them to have.

Similarly, it has been held that if a statute authorizing a pardoned criminal to maintain an action for damages in the court of claims should be construed as an enactment that the person convicted was innocent, and that his conviction was improper, it was unconstitutional as an invasion by the legislature of the judicial department of the government. Roberts v. State (1899) 30 App. Div. 106, 51 N. Y. Supp. 691, affirmed (1899) 160 N. Y. 217, 54 N. E. 678, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 561, where it was said: "If the act under consideration can be sustained, we see no reason to doubt that in any case where a criminal has been convicted of a crime and imprisoned, the legislature, on his being pardoned, or on the expiration of his term of imprisonment, may retry the question of his guilt or innocence, or authorize a tribunal of its own selection to do so, and may thereupon sanction an allowance of a claim for damages against the state. The effect of holding that the legislature possesses this power would be deplorable. Judgments in criminal cases would only be final, effectual, and valid at the will of the legislature. We are satisfied that the legislature possesses no power to annul the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, or to retry the questions necessarily passed upon in the rendition of such judgment, or to authorize any board or tribunal created by it to exercise such powers."

An act to reverse and annul the judgment of a supreme court for treason is unconstitutional. Re Dorr (1854) 3 R. I. 299. M. B.

HAROLD A. ANDREWS, Appt.,

v.

ALBERT HAAS et al., Respts.

New York Court of Appeals — February 25, 1916.

(214 N. Y. 255, 108 N. E. 423.)

Damages — for discontinuing suit conducted for contingent fee.

1. The value of the services rendered, and not the amount which would have been secured had the suit been pressed, is the measure of damages in case a client discontinues a suit for the conduct of which he has employed an attorney on a contingent fee.

[See note on this question beginning on page 472.]

Contract — implied — illegal.

2. The law will not imply an agreement which would be illegal, if it were express.

[See 6 R. C. L. 588.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Nassau County, dismissing a complaint filed to recover damages for alleged breach of a contract of employment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Harold A. Andrewes, in propria persona:

Performance is pronounced when performance has been prevented by the other party, and the measure of damages is the sum agreed to be paid in the event of complete success.

Public policy prohibits an attorney from acquiring such an interest in his client's cause of action as will prevent the client from, in good faith, settling the litigation or abandoning it.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a member of the bar. He complains that the defendants refused to prosecute an action in which they had retained him as their lawyer. The agreement was, he says, that they would sue for $180,000, and pay him 25 per cent of the amount recovered. He drafted a complaint for them, but there the action stopped. The defendants refused to go on with it. They were advised and became convinced, as they now allege in their answer, that the action was without merit. Because of their refusal to proceed with it the plaintiff says that they owe him $45,000. In opening his case he declined to prove the value of his services up to the time when the case was halted; he took his stand upon the ground that he was entitled to the profits that would have come to him if his clients had pressed the case to a successful conclusion. At the close of his opening the complaint was dismissed.

The employment of a lawyer to serve for a contingent fee does not make it the client's duty to continue the lawsuit, and thus increase the lawyer's profit. The lawsuit is his own. He may drop it when he will.

Even an express agreement to pay damages for dropping it without his lawyer's consent would be against public policy and void. Re Snyder, 190 N. Y. 66, 69, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 533, 82 N. E. 742, 13 Ann. Cas. 441. The law will not imply an agreement which would be illegal, if it were express. It will not, Contract—implied—illegal.

under the coercion of damages, constrain an unwilling suitor to keep a litigation alive for the profit of its officers. Tenney v. Berger, 93 N. Y. 524, 45 Am. Rep. 263; Re Dunn, 205 N. Y. 398, 402, 98 N. E. 914, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 536; Nutt v. Knut, 200 U. S. 12, 21, 50 L. ed. 348, 353, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 216; Mesa County Nat. Bank v. Berry, 24 Colo. App. 487, 135 Pac. 129. The notion that such a thing is possible betrays a strange misconception of the function of the legal profession, and of its duty to society. When the defendants abandoned the action, they became liable to the plaintiff for the value of the services then rendered. Damages—for discontinuing suit conducted for contingent fee.

That is the measure of their liability and of his right.

We have been referred to cases where clients, after retaining a lawyer for a contingent fee, have continued the litigation through another lawyer, and have been held answerable in damages. Martin v. Camp, 161 App. Div. 610, 146 N. Y. Supp. 1041; Carlisle v. Barnes, 102 App. Div. 573, 92 N. Y. Supp. 917. We are not required at this time either to approve or to condemn those rulings. They have not passed unchallenged. Martin v. Camp, supra; Johnson v. Ravitch, 113 App. Div. 810, 99 N. Y. Supp. 1059. In those cases, and in others like them, the clients went on with the lawsuit. Here they abandoned it. We refuse to hold that they were bound to pay their lawyer as if they had gone on with it and won it.

The plaintiff's claim is without merit. The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., and Hisecock, Chase, Cuddeback, Miller, and Seabury, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The question as to the amount or basis of recovery by an attorney who takes a case on a contingent fee, where the client discontinues, settles, or compromises, is discussed in the note following SOUTHWORTH v. ROSENDAHL, post, 472. For cases dealing with a discontinuance or dismissal of the case by the client, see subdivisions II. b, and III. of that note.

v.
LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

A. T. MCCORMACK, Appt.,
v.
SAME.

Kentucky Court of Appeals — December 16, 1913.

(156 Ky. 465, 161 S. W. 518.)

Attorneys — contingent fee — basis of computation.

1. The amount which an attorney, having a contract for a contingent fee on the percentage basis, may recover, under a statute giving attorneys a lien upon all claims put into their hands for the amount of their agreed fees, from one who has entered into a compromise agreement to pay his client a certain sum and the legally taxable costs of the litigation, is to be computed as though the amount paid by way of compromise constituted the entire recovery.

[See note on this question beginning on page 472.]

Appeal — conflicting evidence — review.

2. A finding by the trial court, upon conflicting evidence, as to the value of the services of an expert witness, will not be disturbed on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 202.]

Attorneys — fees — compromise by client.

3. The rule that, where a judgment has been recovered, a client cannot, by compromising, deprive the attorney of his fee according to the contract between them, does not apply where the judgment has been reversed.

[See 2 R. C. L. 1080.]

Estoppel — stare decisis.

4. The principle of stare decisis will not preclude the court from re-examining a question which has been passed upon on a single occasion only, and has not become established as a rule of property.

[See 7 R. C. L. 1000.]

APPEALS by plaintiffs from judgments of the Circuit Court for Warren County in their favor for less than the amounts demanded, in consolidated actions brought to recover fees for services rendered by them in a personal injury action against the defendant railroad company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. B. F. Procter, Grider & Harlin, O'Rear & Williams, and Wright & McElroy for appellants.

Messrs. Sims & Rodas and B. D. Warfield, for appellee:

Plaintiffs have recovered and have been paid all the fees to which they are entitled under their contracts.

Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114; Newport Rolling Mill Co. v. Hall, 147 Ky. 598, 144 S. W. 760; Louisville R. Co. v. Burke, 149 Ky. 437, 149 S. W. 865.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals involve only the fees for services rendered by Dr. A. T. McCormack as a physician, and by B. F. Procter as an attorney, in the action of R. E. Lynch against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for personal injuries.

Having been injured in a collision upon appellee's road at Rockland, Tennessee, Lynch and his brother-in-law, Niemeyer, made the following contract of employment with Procter:

This obligation witnesseth, that I have employed B. F. Procter to adjust by suit or compromise a claim for myself and for E. B. Niemeyer for an injury done to us at Rockland, Tennessee, March 13, 1907, in a collision; he is also to represent a claim for malpractice in treatment of said Niemeyer. It is agreed that we will give all assistance in case of the prosecution of said claim, and for his services we and each of us will pay to said Procter a sum equal to one fourth ( $\frac{1}{4}$ ) received for said injury if compromised before trial, but if a trial is gone into then said Procter is to prosecute said claim in all courts in which it is pending, and for his services he is to receive a sum equal to one third ( $\frac{1}{3}$ ) received for said injuries. If nothing is received he is to receive nothing for his services.

This November 26th, 1907.

R. E. Lynch,
E. B. Niemeyer,
Per R. E. Lynch.

Acting for Lynch, appellant Procter instituted a suit against the appellee in the Warren circuit court, and recovered a judgment for $25,000, which was reversed by this court in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lynch, 137 Ky. 696, 126 S. W. 362. After the case had been remanded to the lower court for a new trial, and before another trial was had, Lynch, acting alone, compromised his case for $10,000, as is shown by the following receipt given by him: "Received of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company ten thousand ($10,000) dollars in full compromise, settlement and adjustment of all claims and demands of every character whatsoever, which I have against said company, its officers, agents, or employees on account of injuries received by me on or about the 13th day of March, 1907, at or near Rockland, Tennessee, and on every other account whatsoever. I hereby agree to dismiss settled my action now pending against said company in the Warren circuit court to recover damages on account of said injuries; the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to pay the legally taxable costs of the litigation which it has not heretofore paid. Witness my hand at Louisville, Kentucky, this May 21, 1910."

The company paid Lynch the $10,000 called for by the settlement, whereupon McCormack and Procter intervened in this action, claiming their fees and a lien therefor. Recognizing its liability under § 107 of the Kentucky Statutes, which gives attorneys a lien upon all claims or demands, including all claims for unliquidated damages put into their hands for suit or collection, for the amount of any fee which may have been agreed upon by the parties, the company offered to pay Procter $2,500, that sum being one fourth of the amount which the company had paid Lynch. Procter, however, claimed that he was entitled to $5,000, since the settlement had been made after trial, in which event he was, by the terms of his contract, entitled to one third of the recovery; that in paying Lynch $10,000, the company had paid Lynch only that part of the recovery which was due him; and that the remaining one third, or $5,000, was due Procter under the contract. The circuit court having held that Procter was entitled to a fee of $3,333.33, the company paid him that sum. Procter appeals, claiming that he was entitled to $5,000, and that there is yet due him $1,666.67.

Before the trial of the action in the circuit court, Dr. A. T. McCormack and another physician were appointed by the court to make a physical examination of Lynch for the purpose of preparing themselves to testify concerning his injuries. Dr. McCormack made the examination, and testified; and for his services he claimed $250. The circuit court allowed him a fee of $50, which was taxed as costs, and paid by the company; and from so much of the judgment as denied him a recovery of the remaining $200, Dr. McCormack appeals.

Disposing of Dr. McCormack's appeal first, it is sufficient to say that, while several witnesses testified that $250 was a reasonable fee for the services he rendered, at least two physicians testified that $50 was a reasonable fee. This question of fact having been tried by the circuit judge, who knew the witnesses and heard them testify, we are not inclined to disturb his finding. Where the proof is contradictory, and the mind is left in doubt upon a question of fact, this court will not disturb the finding of fact by the chancellor. Byassee v. Evans, 143 Ky. 415, 136 S. W. 857; Kirkpatrick v. E. Rehkoph Saddlery Co. 144 Ky. 134, 137 S. W. 862; Wathen v. Wathen, 149 Ky. 505, 149 S. W. 902; Bond v. Bond, 150 Ky. 389, 150 S. W. 363. The judgment is therefore affirmed upon Dr. McCormack's appeal.

Turning to Procter's appeal, we find he relies upon Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Procter, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 447, 51 S. W. 591; Procter Coal Co. v. Tye, 123 Ky. 381, 96 S. W. 512, and Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis, 149 Ky. 449, 149 S. W. 894, for a reversal of the judgment which passed upon his claim. A careful reading of the opinions in those cases will show, however, that none of them comes up to the position contended for by appellant. A brief examination of those opinions will show that fact.

In the first case, in 21 Ky. L. Rep. 447, the plaintiff had recovered a judgment for $1,000 against the railroad company, and subsequently compromised it for $300. In that case Procter, the plaintiff's attorney, had a contract for a fee of one half of the amount recovered; and the effect of the opinion was, that where a client had compromised a claim, which had already been reduced to judgment, by accepting less than the judgment in satisfaction thereof, his act in so settling his judgment did not deprive the attorney of his fee according to his contract, when applied to the existing judgment. In that case the judgment was in force, and it was therefore a correct measure of the company's liability. In the case at bar, however, Lynch had no judgment at the time he made the settlement; and the fact that he had previously received a judgment which had been reversed cannot affect the question. When the case went back to the circuit court for trial, so far as Lynch and his attorney were concerned, it stood as though he had never recovered a judgment, and as though his suit had just been brought and was awaiting trial for the first time.

Attorneys—
fees—compromise by client.

Attorneys—fees—compromise by client.

In Procter Coal Co. v. Tye, supra, the case was compromised by the plaintiff Chandler before trial; and, the attorneys having no express contract as to the amount of their fee, they were allowed to recover upon a quantum meruit. It appeared, however, that although the plaintiff had received but a small sum of money, he obtained a contract by which he was to be given employment by the defendant company as long as it remained in existence. The court held that the attorneys were entitled, in fixing their fee upon a quantum meruit basis, to show the value of the contract between the company and Chandler for future employment. And, in speaking of the effect of the statute giving attorneys a lien for their fees, the court said: "This statute was not intended to deny to parties to an action the right to settle their differences independent of their attorneys, and without notice to them; but if they do so settle, and money or other thing of value is paid by the defendant to plaintiff as a consideration for the settlement, the attorney for plaintiff may recover from the defendant a reasonable fee for his services. Nor was it designed to prevent the compromise or settlement of lawsuits out of court by the parties. The only purpose of it is to provide a means whereby attorneys who have been instrumental in bringing the settlement about, by reason of the claim being placed in their hands for collection, shall receive a reasonable compensation for the services they have rendered."

Again, in Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis, Alexander, the plaintiff, settled his claim for $250 in money, a house and lot, and permanent employment in the service of the company. For a fee the attorneys had a contract for a sum equivalent to 50 per cent of the amount recovered by suit or otherwise. It will be seen that in this case, as in the Tye Case, it became necessary to determine what the recovery was, by ascertaining the value of the contract for future service and the house and lot, and that the attorneys were entitled to one half of that sum. It will thus be seen that neither of these cases bears directly upon the case at bar.

The question presented by this appeal has, however, been squarely decided by this court in Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114. In that case, Mrs. Linns, the plaintiff, employed Schmitz, an attorney, to prosecute a damage suit for her against the company under a contract to pay the attorney, as a fee, a sum equivalent to one half of any sum that might be collected or recovered by suit, compromise, or otherwise. After the suit had been instituted, and before trial, Mrs. Linns settled her case for $1,500, the company further agreeing, as a part of the settlement, to pay Schmitz, her attorney, the fee agreed upon between him and Mrs. Linns. It will be observed that this is precisely the agreement the appellee in the case at bar made with Lynch as to paying Procter's fee. In the Schmitz Case, the company offered to pay Schmitz $750, that sum being one half of the amount it had paid Mrs. Linns. Schmitz, however, contended that he was entitled to $1,500, under his contract for one half of the recovery, just as Procter is claiming $5,000 in the case at bar, under his contract for one third of the recovery. In the Schmitz Case, however, this court affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, which allowed Schmitz $750 instead of $1,500.

—contingent fee—basis of computation.

We are now asked to re-examine the question and to overrule the Schmitz Case. The question in that case was, however, carefully considered and thoroughly argued, as fully appears from the opinion. The gist of the opinion and the reasons for the conclusion reached are found in the following extract taken from page 211 of 131 Ky., of that opinion: "The attorney, independent of his client, had no cause of action whatever against the company. His claim against it resulted entirely from his employment. If his client had no claim against the company, neither did the attorney. If the client did not recover anything, neither could the attorney. The amount of the attorney's recovery depended entirely upon the amount recovered by his client. He was to get a share or interest in whatever amount his client received, and hence, in determining what the attorney was entitled to, we must of necessity ascertain what the client secured, as the attorney is only entitled to one half of that amount. The venture of the attorney and the client as between themselves may be treated as a partnership in the sense that the attorney was to receive an amount equal to one half of the sum recovered by the client, but this partnership did not increase the liability of the company. Its obligation was to pay to the attorney the fee the client would have to pay—no more and no less—and it is clear that the client could only be required to pay one half of the amount recovered. If the case had gone to trial, and a judgment had been rendered for $1,500, the client and attorney under the agreement would share equally in the recovery, solely because the attorney was to get one half of the recovery, and in this state of case the client would only receive $750; but, if a third party had come in and assumed to pay the attorney his fee, then the client would receive $1,500, and the attorneys $750. It does not follow from the fact that, because the client received $1,500, the attorney is entitled to a like amount. The amount the attorney is entitled to receive is absolutely fixed by the amount paid to the client. If the attorney receives one half the amount his client receives, it does not concern him whether he is paid that amount by his client or by some other person." And, as pointed out in that opinion, if the company had been insolvent, and the attorney could not for that reason have recovered any part of his fee from the company, clearly he could not have recovered more than $750 from his client. And, as his claim against the company arises only from his employment by his client, it is difficult to understand how his claim can be any greater against the company than it could have been against his client.

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, it is said that, when a rule has been once deliberately adopted and declared, it ought not to be disturbed unless by a court of appeal or review, and never by the same court, except for very urgent reasons, and upon a clear manifestation of error; and that, if the practice were otherwise, it would be leaving us in a perplexed uncertainty as to the law. 7th ed. p. 84.

Upon the principle of stare decisis, the decisions which have been rendered by a court will be adhered to by such court in subsequent cases, unless there is something manifestly erroneous therein, or the rule or principle of law established by such decisions has been changed by legislative enactment. 11 Cyc. 746. And, while we are not unmindful of the salutary tendency of the rule stare decisis, we are, at the same time, not averse to re-examining a question which has been passed upon on a single occasion only, and has not established a rule of property. Montgomery County Fiscal Ct. v. Trimble, 104 Ky. 639, 42 L.R.A. 738, 47 S. W. 773.

stare decisis.

We have, therefore, carefully re-examined the question decided in the Schmitz Case, and, being of opinion that the rule there announced is sound in every particular, it is approved and followed.

Judgment affirmed in each appeal.

Turner, J., dissenting:

I must respectfully dissent from so much of the opinion of the court as holds the appellant Procter is only entitled to recover from appellee $3,333.33.

There is no disputed fact in the record, and, in my view, no question of law presented, but really only a question of calculation. The uncontradicted facts are that Procter and Lynch entered into the contract quoted in the opinion of the court; that the suit was instituted by Procter and diligently prosecuted; that there was a verdict for $25,000 which, upon appeal to this court, was reversed; that upon the return of the case to the lower court, and before another trial was had, negotiations looking to a settlement were pending between the attorneys for the parties; that at the very time Lynch made the settlement, appellee had pending a proposition by it to settle the case for $15,000; that, while that proposition was pending, Lynch went to Louisville and settled with the appellee's attorney for $10,000 net to him (Lynch), with the agreement at the time that the company would pay Procter under the terms of Lynch's contract with him, which contract was before the attorney for the appellee at the time the settlement with Lynch was made.

In order that the circumstances may be fully understood, I quote as follows from the uncontradicted testimony of Lynch as to this settlement. In answer to a question from Procter, he said: "I went to Warfield's office in Louisville on my own free will and accord to make a settlement of this case. When I went, after talking over the matter some time, Mr. Warfield asked me as to the conditions of the contract between you and I. I told him about the contract. He asked me if I had it with me. I told him I did, and he asked me if I had any objections to him reading it. I told him none whatever, and I showed him the contract, and after reading the contract, he offered to compromise for $10,000 net to me. He agreed to pay all legal taxable court costs, your part of the contract, and whatever the contract was with Wright & McElroy, and Dr. Hagan's bill. I told him, after looking over the contract that he drew up, that your name was not on there. He said your part would be paid according to the contract, and with his assurance that it would, I agreed to accept it."

We have then a corporation admitting a liability, in full possession of the fact that one third of that liability is going to and payable to one party, and deliberately, with its eyes open and in full possession of all the facts, settling with another party two thirds of that liability for $10,000, and agreeing to settle the remaining part of it with the other party; thereby, by its own act, fixing its liability to the third party at $5,000. Suppose the liability had grown out of a contract instead of a tort, and suppose the contractual liability was payable, two thirds to one man and one third to another, could it, by paying in full the one to whom was due the two thirds, have reduced its liability to the other? In my mind there can be no difference in principle; if there had been a disputed contractual liability, and it had fixed the amount of ultimate liability by settling with one who was only entitled to a part of the recovery, it would not thereafter be heard to say that it was not proportionately liable to the other party.

But it is argued that it is against the policy of the law not to permit a party to compromise or settle out of court his litigation, even without the consent of his attorney, and that is true; but it is sufficient to say in this case that the client did not undertake to settle the whole liability of the defendant, but only to settle that part which was coming to Lynch, which, under the terms of the contract, was two thirds. The company expressly agreed, with the contract before it, that it would settle with Procter; by the very terms of its settlement with Lynch it fixed the amount which it must pay to Procter. It may be very readily admitted that it was within the power of Lynch to have made a settlement of the whole liability at $10,000 without the consent of Procter, and if he had done so it would have absolutely fixed Procter's fee at one third of that amount; but this he did not undertake to do. On the contrary, he settled only what was coming to him under the contract; that is, he was paid $10,000 net, with the agreement that the company, having the contract between him and Procter before it at the time, would settle with Procter; that is to say, the company, at the time, agreed to pay Procter one half as much as it had paid Lynch, because it knew from the very terms of the contract that Procter was entitled to that much.

The company admits its liability to Procter for a fee under the terms of this contract, and a majority of the court have determined that $3,333.33 is what it must pay, and that amount has been, as shown by the record, paid Procter. Let us see by a simple calculation whether that is a compliance with the terms of the contract. The company has paid Lynch $10,000; it has paid Procter $3,333.33; the aggregate of those sums is $13,333.33. Has Procter received one third of that liability which the company now admits? Certainly not; he has only received one fourth of it, and the terms of his contract have been violated over his protest.

In my view of this case the only question is, Of what sum is $10,000 two thirds? I am of the opinion that appellant Procter is entitled to his $5,000 fee, and that the case of Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114, should be overruled. As long as the rule therein laid down obtains, an easy opportunity is offered agents of corporations to procure from ignorant, dishonest, or improvident persons having claims against them, settlements which will defraud attorneys out of part of their just compensation, to say nothing of their contract rights.

While it is not the policy of the law to discourage settlements between litigants, or to prevent a party from settling without the consent of his attorney, we all know, as a matter of common experience, that settlements made with a litigant in the absence of his attorney (the attorney of the other party being present) is not conducive, as a general rule, to fair or equitable adjustments.

The reference in the opinion to the doctrine of stare decisis can be viewed in no other light than as an apology for the opinion in the Schmitz Case. If that opinion was and is still right, what necessity is there for invoking the doctrine of stare decisis to continue in force the unfortunate doctrine announced therein?

Nunn, J., concurs in this dissent.

NOTE.

In this case the stipulation in the settlement agreement, that the defendant was to pay the "legally taxable costs of the litigation," is apparently treated in both opinions as raising the same question involved in Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. (1908) 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114, in which the defendant, in settling with the plaintiff, agreed as a part of the settlement to pay plaintiff's attorney the fee agreed upon between him and plaintiff. This question is discussed in the note following SOUTHWORTH v. ROSENDAHL, post, 472, on "Amount or basis of recovery by attorney who takes case on contingent fee, where client discontinues, settles, or compromises," under the subhead, "Effect of agreement by defendant to pay attorney."

WALTER N. SOUTHWORTH et al., Appts.,
v.
OLE ROSENDAHL, Respt.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 7, 1916.

(133 Minn. 447; 158 N. W. 717.)

Attorney — contingent fee — settlement — compensation.

1. Where the client exercises his legal right to settle with his adversary, in good faith and without purpose to defraud the attorney out of his compensation, the latter may recover only the reasonable value of the services rendered by him down to the time of the settlement.

[See note on this question beginning on page 472.]

—right of client to compromise suit.

2. The relation of attorney and client does not preclude the latter from settling and compromising the matters in litigation in his own way, and without the knowledge or consent of the attorney, and by so doing he does not subject himself to the payment to the attorney of a contingent fee agreed upon in case of the successful outcome of the case.

—effect of agreement not to compromise.

3. A client may, without the consent of his attorney, settle and compromise with his adversary all matters in litigation in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem necessary for his own interest, even though he has expressly agreed with his attorney that he will not settle or compromise without his consent or approval.

[See 2 R. C. L. 1001.]

Contract — right to terminate performance.

4. In executory contracts, either party has the power to arrest performance by specific direction to that effect, thereby subjecting himself to damages as for breach of contract.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case, though in some respects disputed or left in doubt by the evidence, may, for the purposes of the decision, be conceded to be substantially as follows: Defendant was the owner of certain real property the title to which was somewhat involved, the particulars with respect to which are immaterial, and certain litigation was pending in the courts concerning the same, in which he was plaintiff. Plaintiffs in this action, attorneys at law, were retained by him to take charge of and conduct the litigation in his behalf, and to institute such other or further actions or proceedings as the attorneys should deem necessary to the protection of his rights in and to the property. Plaintiffs claim that at the time of such retainer it was expressly agreed that, if successful in the litigation, they should receive and defendant would pay them as and for their compensation the sum of $10,000; but if they failed in their efforts to clear up defendant's title, they should receive no compensation at all. The property involved was valued at about $100,000. There is no controversy in the evidence as to the employment of plaintiffs to conduct the litigation, though defendant denied that he agreed to pay them $10,000 if they were successful in the suit. But for the purposes of the case we assume that he did so agree. Subsequent to the retainer plaintiffs rendered certain services in the pending action, the nature and extent of which do not fully appear and are not important. Thereafter, and without notice to plaintiffs or either of them, defendant amicably settled and compromised the matter in litigation with the adverse party, and the litigation was thus brought to an end, dispensing with the further services of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs then brought this action to recover the amount of the agreed compensation, namely, $10,000. A verdict was returned for defendant, and plaintiffs appealed from an order denying a new trial.

The assignments of error challenge certain rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence and certain parts of the charge to the jury, but, as our conclusion upon the main question involved is adverse to the right of plaintiffs to recover, and completely disposes of the case on the merits, it becomes unnecessary to consider them. We therefore limit our consideration of the case to the question whether plaintiffs, under the facts stated, are entitled to recover upon the express contract, or whether their remedy is in quantum meruit, for the reasonable value of their services.

It is well settled that a client may, without the consent of his attorney, settle and compromise with his adversary all matters in litigation, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem necessary for the protection of his interests. Boogren v. St. Paul City R. Co. 97 Minn. 51, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 379, 114 Am. St. Rep. 691, 106 N. W. 104; Paulson v. Lyson, 12 N. D. 354, 97 N. W. 533, 1 Ann. Cas. 245; 2 R. C. L. p. 1000, and page 1080, § 171.

No vested right of the attorney is violated or impaired, and the rule applies notwithstanding an express agreement with the attorney that he will not settle a compromise without his consent or approval. 6 C. J. § 318, p. 743; Huber v. Johnson, 68 Minn. 74, 64 Am. St. Rep. 456, 70 N. W. 806. The late Justice Mitchell tersely stated the rule in the case just cited as follows: "The law favors the compromise of disputes without litigation, and it is difficult to conceive of any stipulation more against public policy than one which prohibits a party from settling his own dispute, or at least prevents it, except by his subjecting himself to the payment of an arbitrary penalty for doing so; and this is the stipulation which plaintiff is seeking to enforce in this action. We think it is void as against public policy."

Plaintiffs do not question the rule, nor its application, and the case involves no controversy respecting the legal right of a client to settle his dispute with his adversary in his own way in all cases, and we have only to consider whether plaintiffs are entitled to the agreed compensation.

The authorities are not in harmony upon the question. It has been held by some of the courts that, where an attorney is employed for a particular litigated controversy with an agreement for a fixed compensation in the event of a successful termination of the case, and thereafter the client, without cause or justifiable reason, discharges the attorney and employs another, who proceeds with the matter to a successful end, the attorney is entitled to the agreed compensation. Moyer v. Cantieny, 41 Minn. 242, 42 N. W. 1060; Brodie v. Watkins, 33 Ark. 545, 34 Am. Rep. 49; Webb v. Trescony, 76 Cal. 621, 18 Pac. 796; Kersey v. Garton, 77 Mo. 646; 2 Thornton, Attys. § 450. This doctrine finds support in, and in fact is founded upon, the general principle of liability where one party to an executory contract wrongfully prevents the other from performing the same. But the rule can have no application to the case at bar; for there was no wrong as against plaintiffs in the act of defendant in compromising the matters in dispute with the adverse party. Plaintiffs' contract of employment was subject to an exercise of that right by defendant. The Cantieny Case, supra, upon which plaintiffs to some extent rely, is not controlling; for there the attorney was discharged by the client, and the case was thus brought within the general rule of liability just referred to. There are, however, authorities which directly support the contention that the attorney is entitled to the agreed compensation in the case of a settlement by the client as well as in the case of a wrongful discharge of the attorney. Cheshire v. Des Moines City R. Co. 153 Iowa, 88, 133 N. W. 324, and authorities cited in 2 Thornton, Attys. § 456. The theory supporting the decisions so holding is that by the settlement the client waives full performance by the attorney, entitling him to the agreed compensation. But that theory of the law is not supported by the weight of authority. 2 Thornton, Attys. § 457; French v. Cunningham, 149 Ind. 632, 49 N. E. 797; Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Semmes, 73 Md. 9, 20 Atl. 127; Harris v. Root, 28 Mont. 159, 72 Pac. 429; Duke v. Harper, 8 Mo. App. 296; Re Snyder, 190 N. Y. 66, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101, 123 Am. St. Rep. 533, 82 N. E. 742, 13 Ann. Cas. 441. It is not in harmony with the trend of our own decisions upon the subject. In Gammans v. Johnson, 69 Minn. 488, 72 N. W. 563, a case involving a settlement by the client without the consent of the attorney, it was held that the attorney was entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services, but could not recover the agreed compensation. The contract there before the court was held void, as champertous, but that fact does not change the rule made the basis of the decision. We have also held that, where the settlement is made in good faith and without purpose to defraud the attorney, the amount of the settlement may be taken as the basis for the computation of the attorney's agreed per cent of the recovery. Davis v. Great Northern R. Co. 128 Minn. 356, 151 N. W. 128. The rule is otherwise where the settlement was fraudulent, and with a purpose of cheating the attorney out of his fees. Desaman v. Butler Bros. 118 Minn. 198, 136 N. W. 747, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 642. It is a rule of general application applied by this court, that in execu-

ment not to

tory contracts either party has the power to arrest performance by specific directions to that effect, thereby subjecting himself to damages as for a breach of contract. Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499, 22 L.R.A. 80, 53 N. W. 756; 3 Notes to Minn. Rep. 875. The contract involved in that case was one between laymen, but that is not a differentiating fact, for the general principles of the law of contracts apply to transactions between attorney and client, as well as between other persons. Logically considered, these various decisions are on principle opposed to plaintiffs' contention, though they do not reach the precise point of the case. But we think that the precise point was reached, and the foundation of the rule limiting the attorney to the reasonable value of his services disclosed, in the reasons given for the decision in Huber v. Johnson, supra. The contract in that case contained a stipulation prohibiting a settlement by the party in interest, and a further stipulation imposed upon him, in the event he did settle the matter, an arbitrary amount, to be paid the other party without regard to the value of services rendered by him. The court held the contract void as against public policy, that the attorney could not recover the agreed compensation, and the ruling is supported by practically all the authorities upon facts similar to those there presented. If a contract of that kind be void as against public policy because it subjects the party to a penalty for exercising a legal right the exercise of which the law approves and encourages, there would seem slight basis for a rule of law which would subject the party to the same penalty for exercising the same right in the case where there was no stipulation prohibiting its exercise. A decision that would award the penalty in such case would be not only inconsistent, but flatly contradictory of the rule applied in the Huber performance.

to terminate

Case,—a rule which finds general support in the books. 6 C. J. 745; Ibert v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (D. C.) 213 Fed. 996; Pratt v. Kerns, 123 Ill. App. 86; Ellwood v. Wilson, 21 Iowa, 523; Henry v. Vance, 111 Ky. 72, 63 S. W. 273; Polsley v. Anderson, 7 W. Va. 202, 23 Am. Rep. 613; French v. Cunningham, 149 Ind. 632, 49 N. E. 797. The fact that in actions for the recovery of money the amount of the settlement is made the basis of measuring the agreed per centum fee of the attorney in no way conflicts with the theory that his compensation in a case of this kind should be measured by the reasonable value of the services rendered. This is not a percentage agreement, but one for a fixed amount in an action involving rights and interests in real property, and the rule of quantum meruit is appropriately applicable. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Semmes, 73 Md. 9, 20 Atl. 127; Duke v. Harper, 8 Mo. App. 296. Nor does the further fact appearing in the case at bar, that the parties agreed that the property involved in the litigation was worth the sum of $100,000, in any proper view change the rule. This covers the case on the merits. Plaintiffs cannot recover the agreed compensation. They are limited to the reasonable value of their services, which cannot be recovered in this action, for the complaint is not so framed. Yet the judgment to be rendered herein will not defeat a subsequent action therefor. Leonard v. Schall, 132 Minn. 446, 157 N. W. 723.

The scope of this note is clearly indicated by the title, and it is only necessary to say here that the note does not include questions as to the measure of recovery where a contract for a contingent fee is for any reason held invalid, or where the attorney is discharged and other attorneys substituted, even though a compromise is involved, if it is the invalidity of the contract or the discharge of the attorney that raises the question as to the measure of recovery. It should, however, be borne in mind that clients sometimes discharge their attorneys as a preliminary step in making a compromise, and there are doubtless some cases included in which there was a formal discharge of this kind. And as some courts treat the questions under annotation as branches of the law governing the discharge of attorneys, it may be said that the rule seems to be that when an attorney employed on a contingent fee is discharged by the client, the measure of recovery is not the contingent fee, but the reasonable value of the services rendered. 2 R. C. L. pp. 1048, 1049. Some cases, however, apparently recognize the attorney's right to recover damages for the breach of contract in lieu of, or in addition to, compensation for the services rendered.

Some other related matters which are excluded from this note will be mentioned under particular headings.

II. Contingent fees consisting of a percentage of the recovery or amount involved.

a. Compromise or settlement.

1. General rule.

Cases merely assuming without controversy that the measure of recovery is the stipulated percentage of the amount for which the case was compromised, and cases dealing with the right of the attorney to continue the client's action, notwithstanding the settlement, have not been included unless they expressly discuss the measure of recovery. Some of the cases of the latter class may, however, proceed upon the assumption that the amount of the settlement does not fix the attorney's rights. See Texas C. R. Co. v. Andrews (1902) 28 Tex. Civ. App. 477, 67 S. W. 923; Potter v. Ajax Min. Co. (1899) 19 Utah, 421, 57 Pac. 270, on second appeal (1900) 22 Utah, 276, 61 Pac. 999.

By the weight of authority where an attorney is employed on a contingent fee consisting of a percentage of the amount recovered, and the client compromises the case, the amount for which the case is settled is the basis on which the attorney's percentage is to be computed.

The attorney is not limited to the reasonable value of his services if less than the specified percentage of the amount of the settlement, or entitled to recover such reasonable value if greater than such specified percentage. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kirtley (1915) 120 Ark. 389, 179 S. W. 648; Cheshire v. Des Moines City R. Co. (1911) 153 Iowa, 88, 133 N. W. 324; Crosby v. Hatch (1912) 155 Iowa, 312, 135 N. Supp. 78; Re Winkler (1913) 154 App. Div. 532, 139 N. Y. Supp. 755.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Givens (1891) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 491, the court said: "In this case, then, has Carnes a lien upon any amount except the amount received by his client? We think not. His services were, of course, worth more than that, and it is a hardship upon him to thus limit his fee, but it is a hardship brought about by the law and his contract. He agreed to accept a sum equal to one half the amount recovered by his client. If the action had been prosecuted to a judgment which awarded Givens $26, it could not be contended that Carnes would have been entitled to more than a sum equal to one half of it. His client agreed, as he had the unquestioned right to do, to accept $26 in full payment of his claim. There is no charge of fraud or collusion in the settlement between Givens and the appellant. Then by what process of reasoning can the appellant be made responsible to Carnes for a larger fee than that agreed on between himself and his client when he was employed to institute the suit?" It was held that the court erred in admitting proof as to what would be a reasonable fee.

In Murray v. Waring Hat Mfg. Co. (1911) 142 App. Div. 514, 127 N. Y. Supp. 78, an attorney brought an action for death under a contract entitling him to 40 per cent of any recovery or settlement. It was held that as the contract was made in good faith, and as its terms were not unconscionable when made, the attorney's compensation could not be cut down to a sum which the court believed to be reasonable compensation, on the ground that 40 per cent of the settlement would be excessive compensation for the services which the attorney had rendered. The court said: "If the compensation seemed large when finally determined by the resistance of the defendant to the claim, it must be remembered that the compensation was contingent, and therefore properly larger than if absolute . . . and that, when entered into, the extent of the services required could not be forecast."

In Oklahoma, the measure of recovery is regulated by statute, and the general rule as above stated is not applied. In Texas it was decided in an early case that the attorney was entitled to the full amount of the fee as if the contingency had transpired upon which the payment of the fee was made to depend. Hill v. Cunningham (1860) 25 Tex. 25. Though the fee involved in that case was not a percentage of the recovery, the decision was apparently regarded as applying to such fees, and is apparently still regarded as stating the general rule. For convenience the cases from these two states will be considered below in separate subdivisions.

In Arkansas, the statute at one time provided that where a suit in which attorneys were employed on a contingent fee was compromised by the parties, the attorneys should have a right of action against them for a "reasonable fee," to be fixed by the court or jury. Bush v. Prescott & N. W. R. Co. (1907) 83 Ark. 210, 103 S. W. 176; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kirtley (1915) 120 Ark. 389, 179 S. W. 648. The statute was, however, impliedly repealed by the Attorneys' Lien Statute, and the general rule, as above stated, now applies. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kirtley (Ark.) supra.

It is also possible that some of the other cases cited below are in conflict with the general rule. See particularly Kersey v. Garton (1888) 77 Mo. 645, and Duke v. Harper (1880) 8 Mo. App. 296.

2. Applications of rule.

The general rule stated in the preceding subdivision proceeds on the theory that the client may settle his cause of action for any sum which he chooses to accept, and that when the parties have in good faith agreed on a certain sum, the sum agreed on is conclusive on the attorney so far as the amount of his compensation is concerned. It follows that if the parties in good faith agree to settle for a specified sum, and the opposite party thereupon pays the whole of such sum to the client, the fact that an attorney's lien statute compels him to pay an additional sum to the attorney does not entitle the attorney to have his percentage computed on the whole amount that the opposite party will ultimately be required to pay, as this is not the amount for which the client agreed to settle. Under such circumstances, therefore, an attorney who was to receive 50 per cent of the recovery is only entitled to 50 per cent of the amount paid the client, and not an amount equal to that paid the client. Czecziotka v. Hammond Glue Co. (1914) 185 Ill. App. 559; Case v. Emerson-Brantingham Co. (1915) 269 Ill. 94, 109 N. E. 671, affirming (1914) 195 Ill. App. 209; Whitcotton v. St. Louis & H. R. Co. (1913) 250 Mo. 624, 157 S. W. 776. This application of the rule is open to some criticism, and will again be considered in another subdivision in connection with the question arising where the defendant agrees with the client to pay the attorney in addition to the payment made to the client.

Where the client agreed not to compromise the claim without the attorney's consent, and to pay the attorney a fee of $250 if he compromised for less than $500, the attorney was only entitled to the agreed percentage of the amount paid on a settlement, though less than $500. The right to claim the fee of $250 was dependent solely on the provision denying the client the right to settle or adjust his claim without the attorney's consent, and that being void and unenforceable, the claim to such fee fell with it. Louisville R. Co. v. Burke (1912) 149 Ky. 437, 149 S. W. 865. But see Riou v. Fraser (1909) Rap. Jud. Quebec 37 C. S. 1, cited infra, III.

And where the contract provided that in case of a settlement the attorneys' compensation should not be limited to the agreed percentage in case a reasonable compensation for their services should exceed that sum, the recovery was limited to the agreed percentage in the absence of evidence of the value of their services. Rickel v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1900) 112 Iowa, 148, 83 N. W. 957.

Where an attorney was employed to collect municipal bonds for one fourth of the amount collected, provided the whole amount of the principal and interest was collected, and if he failed to collect the whole amount, he was to receive no fee, and after the recovery of judgment, and while litigation to compel its payment by municipal officers was pending, the client compromised for less than the amount due, the attorney was entitled to one fourth of the amount received by the client. Larned v. Dubuque (1892) 86 Iowa, 166, 53 N. W. 105.

An attorney agreeing to bring and prosecute an action for one half of whatever might be received as damages was entitled to one half of the amount paid by the defendant to the client in settlement of the controversy, and was not limited to reasonable compensation, since if he failed to "prosecute" the action, within the meaning of the contract, it was owing to the settlement. Nor does the fact that the payment was for the purpose of getting rid of the controversy, and not as an admission that there was anything due "as damages," defeat the attorney's right to one half of such sum. Cheshire v. Des Moines City R. Co. (1911) 153 Iowa, 88, 133 N. W. 324.

Where attorneys are employed to bring a suit to establish a will in favor of a person who would take a part of the estate if the will were not established, under an agreement that they shall receive 15 per cent of the value of the estate realized as the result of the suit or litigation or by compromise, and the client compromises the case, they are only entitled to the agreed percentage of the amount by which the settlement exceeds the amount which the client would have taken in any event. The contract is open to this construction and should be so construed under the rule that an ambiguous contract should be construed against the party who selected its language. Belch v. Schott (1913) 171 Mo. App. 357, 157 S. W. 658.

And where an attorney was to be paid 10 per cent of the amount by which he might succeed in getting a decree reduced, and, on appeal, the court struck out certain items and granted a new trial, but, before the new trial, the attorney died, and the client thereafter settled with the adverse party for less than the amount of the decree as reduced by the court, the attorney was held entitled only to 10 per cent of the reduction by the court. Nickels v. Kane (1886) 82 Va. 309.

Where an attorney was employed to bring an action by an executor for the death of his testator for one third of the amount received in case of a settlement before trial, and 50 per cent in case of trial, whether compromised thereafter or not, in addition to taxable costs, and before trial the defendant settled with the widow and sole beneficiary of the deceased for $400, it was held that this amount was the amount received within the meaning of the contract, and that the attorney's right to compensation was limited to not more than 50 per cent of $400 and the taxable costs, and that, there being no claim of fraud, it was error to submit the case to the jury for the purpose of permitting the attorney to recover one half of the verdict. Davis v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1917) 181 App. Div. 228, 167 N. Y. Supp. 868. Why the attorney's recovery was not limited to one third instead of one half of the $400 is not clear.

In Kersey v. Garton (1883) 77 Mo. 645, the court approved a declaration of law that attorneys were entitled to recover as if their contract had been fully performed, but what was actually decided is far from clear. The attorneys were employed to "bring suit for certain land, contingent upon success;" but it does not appear whether it was a percentage fee, though it probably was. The statement says that the client refused to permit the attorneys to proceed, and dismissed the suit, but the opinion intimates that he compromised for $300. How much the attorneys recovered does not appear, but the court says that there was evidence that the client compromised for a sum which was the full value of the land, and that, if so, the recovery of the attorneys was not as much as it should have been.

As to the measure of recovery under a contract providing for a contingent fee of 50 per cent if settled with the attorney's approval, and otherwise—a reasonable fee of not less than the agreed percentage, see Lindskog v.

Conrad Seipp Brewing Co. (1914) 187 Ill. App. 180.

As to the basis of recovery where the compromise was of cross demands and the attorney was to have one half of any amount recovered against the defendant or saved to the plaintiff in the litigation, see Bogle v. Walker (1918) 133 Ark. 294, 202 S. W. 478. The facts in this case are rather complicated and do not seem to have sufficient general interest to justify setting them out.

Some other applications of the rule and exceptions thereto are treated below in separate subdivisions.

3. Where client receives or retains property as result of compromise.

Where attorneys were employed to defend an action to contest a will for one fourth of the property willed to the client if the will was sustained, or one fourth of whatever was recovered by the client by compromise or otherwise, and the parties made a compromise under which plaintiff conveyed to the client a part of the land devised to her, and the client permitted judgment to go against her, setting aside the will, the attorneys were entitled to one fourth of the value of the land conveyed to the client. There was no merit in the contention that the land was not recovered in such action because the judgment did not provide for such recovery. McCall v. Atchley (1914) 256 Mo. 39, 164 S. W. 593.

It is said in Barcus v. Gates (1904) 130 Fed. 364, affirmed in (1905) 69 C. C. A. 200, 136 Fed. 184, that where property is taken by the clients in order to effect a settlement with their debtors, an attorney employed on a contingent fee should receive a percentage of the fair valuation of the property as distinguished from the price at which it is actually taken. There does not seem to have been any compromise in that case, however, but a decree in favor of the clients fixed a lien in their favor on land which they apparently purchased at a sale to satisfy the lien, and the court held that the attorney's compensation should be computed on the actual value of the land, and not on the price at which it was taken.

And where a client settled with his debtor by taking the latter's notes for an amount less than the amount of his claim, an attorney employed to collect the claim for 25 per cent of all amounts collected by him and a like percentage in case of a settlement or compromise by the client was not entitled to the agreed percentage of the amount of the notes until it was ascertained whether the notes were collectable. The attorney's contract provided for a smaller percentage in case the claim was uncollectable, and it was held that if anything could be recovered prior to the collection of the notes, the attorney could recover only this smaller percentage. Mills v. Fox (1855) 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 220.

But where an attorney was employed to bring an action for conversion of personal property against a defendant who claimed a lien on such property, and the client settled by paying the defendant an amount less than the value of the property, and receiving the property, the court, in Re Winkler (1918) 154 App. Div. 532, 139 N. Y. Supp. 755, seems to have computed the attorney's percentage on the value of the chattels, without deducting the amount paid by the client. The attorney was, however, claiming the right to disregard the contract entirely, and recover on a quantum meruit.

Where a claim against a county was adjusted in part by the delivery of county warrants, and the client transferred the balance of the claim, an allowance to the attorneys of their agreed percentage of the currency value of the warrants, without any allowance based on the portion of the claim transferred, was held not unfair to the client, in Jacks v. Thweatt (1882) 39 Ark. 340. Whether it was fair to the attorneys was not decided, as they had not moved for a new trial.

Where an attorney was employed by a settler to bring an action to establish his title to land within the limits of a railroad land grant, for 12½ per cent of the value of any land or money recovered, and a compromise was made whereby the railroad company conveyed a part of the land to the settler and quitclaimed another part to the government to enable it to issue a patent to the settler, it was held that the land quitclaimed to the government was a part of the recovery upon which the attorney's percentage was to be computed. Myers v. Bender (1913) 46 Mont. 497, 129 Pac. 330, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 245. It was also held in this case that as the attorney was to have no interest in the land recovered, but was only to be paid the agreed percentage of the value, he was entitled to receive his compensation when the compromise agreement was made, though the formal conveyances were not made until later, and that his compensation was therefore measured by the value of the land at that time, and evidence of its value subsequently was not admissible.

Where an action for injuries is settled by the defendant paying the client a small sum of money and agreeing to give the client employment as long as it remains in existence, attorneys employed on a contingent fee are entitled to recover a reasonable fee from the defendant (made liable by an attorneys' lien statute), as the amount received by the client is not definite, and it would not be practicable for the attorneys to recover from the defendant the sum they might have required the client to pay. Proctor Coal Co. v. Tye (1906) 123 Ky. 381, 96 S. W. 512.

But where the action was compromised for $250 in money, a house and lot, worth from $200 to $250, and an agreement by the defendant to give the client permanent employment, the rule just stated did not apply, as the amount of money and property paid was not so small as to be inconsequential, and to render the amount recovered uncertain in value. Therefore the attorneys could not recover on quantum meruit, but were entitled to a fee equal to $125, plus one half the value of the house and lot, and also to a sum equal to one half of the value of the contract for permanent employment. Elk Valley Coal Min. Co. v. Willis (1912) 149 Ky. 449, 149 S. W.

894. The court did not attempt to state how the value of the contract for permanent employment was to be determined.

Where a contract under which an attorney was employed to defend an ejectment action provided that he should receive one half of the land, or so much of it as might be held by the client, but also showed that the parties had agreed upon $300 as the money value of the services in case the client refused to deed one half of the land, the attorney was limited to that sum, and could not recover one half of the difference between the value of the land and the amount which the client paid the plaintiff in settlement of the action. Millard v. Jordan (1889) 76 Mich. 131, 42 N. W. 1085. The contract in this case provided that the attorney should receive an undivided half of the land, or, in lieu thereof, $300, and also authorized a compromise by the attorney, and provided that he should have one half of whatever was realized from the compromise or from the plaintiff in the action for a release, the parties to share equally in the land or such part of it as might be held by the client by the determination in the suit or by agreement or compromise with the plaintiff, and in any sum that might be recovered, received, or awarded to the client.

Where an attorney was employed to defend an action to set aside a will and annul a deed, and to bring a third action, under an agreement that he was to be paid $500 if successful, otherwise 10 per cent of the value of the estate involved in litigation, and judgments were entered in favor of his client in each of the suits, but it appeared that such judgments were the result of a compromise under which the client paid $5,000 in one suit and the costs in another, but this compromise was made over the attorney's objection, the court said that the compromise did not affect the contract with the attorney, and that defendant was still liable to him for 10 per cent of the value of the "property." Cosgrove v. Burton (1903) 104 Mo. App. 698, 78 S. W. 667. The attorney, however, had sued on quantum meruit for less than such 10 per cent, and a judgment in his favor on quantum meruit was affirmed.

An attorney employed on a contingent fee to bring an action for breach of promise of marriage was not entitled to any share of property received by the client by operation of law as a result of her subsequent marriage to the defendant, nor to any part of the value of such marriage. Crow v. Mitchell (1917) 269 Mo. 697, L.R.A. 1917D, 912, 192 S. W. 417.

It is held in Topeka Water-Supply Co. v. Root (1895) 56 Kan. 187, 42 Pac. 715, that where attorneys were employed to bring an action to set aside deeds to land for an undivided half of the land, and, pending the action, the client settled by conveying the land to the defendant in the action, for which they were paid a sum of money and given a life lease of the land, the attorneys were entitled to specific performance by the defendant, of the client's agreement to convey them one half of the land. The court said that having contracted to pay them in land, the defendant could not, at its election, require the attorneys to resort to an action for the value in money of the services performed, and take their chance of being able to collect it. The attorneys were, however, required to repay one half of the amount originally paid for the deeds sought to be set aside, and the opinion discusses the merits of the client's action, apparently taking the view that the attorneys' right to recover depended on the client's right to have the deeds set aside.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Semmes (1890) 73 Md. 9, 20 Atl. 127, a telegraph company brought a suit against a railroad company to establish its title to telegraph lines and to recover money received by the railroad company for messages transmitted over such lines. Another telegraph company owning a majority of the stock of the complainant company employed attorneys and agreed to pay them one fifth of the amount which should be recovered for it, as a stockholder. There was a dismissal, and, pending an appeal, the last-mentioned company purchased from the railroad company the property in dispute, thus settling the litigation. It was held that the attorneys were only entitled to reasonable compensation for the work and labor done by them, and were not entitled to "the contingent compensation," and that the question whether the suit could have been brought to a successful issue could not be gone into. It is not quite clear whether the attorneys sought to recover the compensation which they would have recovered if successful, or the agreed percentage of what the telegraph company received as a result of the compromise, or why the court denied the latter, unless it was because of the nature of the compromise, which probably would have prevented any estimate of what the company had received by virtue of the compromise without determining whether it would have been successful in the suit. The court said: "Nor have we the means of ascertaining whether the plaintiffs would have brought the suit to a successful issue if it had not been settled. That could be shown with legal certainty only by the judgment of the tribunal charged with the decision of the case. It is nothing to the purpose that the record is in this court; the question must be decided on principles which would apply to any case. The plaintiffs could not maintain their position in this regard, without showing to the satisfaction of the jury that they would have prevailed in the suit in question. Now can anything be more inconsistent with the settled principles of practice than to submit such a question to the finding of a jury. By what possible means could they be informed what would have been the final decision in the suit? Was it within the competency of the court below to examine the questions in the cause, and to instruct the jury authoritatively as to its result? Most certainly no tribunal had the authority to decide this question, except this court where it was pending; and here, it would have been decided in the orderly and becoming course of justice, after argument by counsel, and patient study and conference on the part of the judges. We cannot consent to introduce into trials at the bar the embarrassment and confusion which would arise from injecting into the bosom of another suit the questions which the law requires to be settled with such careful and cautious deliberation."

See also Coker v. Oliver (1908) 4 Ga. App. 728, 62 S. E. 483, cited infra, II. a, 8.

4. Items of settlement.

Where an action for personal injury is settled by the payment of $275, of which $25 is for medical services, and $50 for the client's expenses in going to the office of the defendant's claim agent, the entire sum must be divided, and the $50 cannot be considered apart from the cause of action which was being settled, there being no claim that it was intended as a gift. Sanders v. Cotton (1918) — Ark. —, 206 S. W. 313.

Where attorneys are employed to bring an action for injuries for one half of the recovery, and the parties settle for $75, the attorneys can recover only one half of that amount from the defendant, who was made liable by an attorneys' lien statute. But where the contract provided that the attorneys should be reimbursed for moneys advanced by them, before a division of the recovery, the defendant was bound by the contract in that respect, and the attorneys were entitled to reimbursement for any legitimate expenses incurred by them. Davis v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 128 Minn. 354, 151 N. W. 128. The court, however, refrained from deciding whether the recovery for such disbursements could exceed the amount of the settlement.

The costs of the action, whether paid by the client or by the defendant in the action, could not be deducted from the amount paid the client before computing the attorney's percentage thereof. Whitcotton v. St. Louis & H. R. Co. (1913) 250 Mo. 624, 157 S. W. 776.

5. Conclusiveness of recited consideration for compromise.

If the true consideration for a settlement is not stated in the release executed by the client, the attorneys are entitled to the agreed percentage of the true consideration, and are not bound by that recited in the release. Whitwell v. Aurora (1909) 139 Mo. App. 597, 123 S. W. 1045. And see Mytton v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1917) — Mo. App. —, 198 S. W. 189, holding that where, for the purpose of defrauding the attorney, an agreement by the defendant to pay the attorney's fee is not included in the written compromise agreement, the attorney may show the real agreement. But see Hurr v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1910) 141 Mo. App. 217, 124 S. W. 1057, holding that if the release contains an agreement that the consideration therein stated is the sole consideration of the release, and that the consideration is contractual, and not a mere recital, the attorney cannot show by oral testimony that the defendant agreed with the client to pay the attorney.

6. Effect of fraud.

It is held in Rodriguez v. Cuelli (1903) 1 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 272, that if a suit is collusively settled for the purpose of defrauding the attorney, who was to be paid a percentage of the recovery, he is entitled to recover at least a reasonable fee for his services. The court does not distinctly hold that he might not recover a specified percentage of the amount of the settlement. There are many cases which recognize that the attorney's compensation might not be limited to the agreed percentage of the amount of the settlement, if the settlement was fraudulent and for the purpose of defrauding the attorney. Of course, the mere making of the settlement without the attorney's knowledge or consent is not such fraud as will have this effect. Substantially all of the cases cited in this note involve settlements that were made without the attorney's consent.

Conceding, without deciding, that if a client settles before verdict, the lien of the attorney is measured by the amount determined upon and actually settled for, and that even after verdict the parties may in good faith settle for less than the verdict, the court held in Desaman v. Butler Bros. (1912) 118 Minn. 198, 136 N. W. 747, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 642, that where a verdict had fixed the amount of plaintiff's cause of action, a secret and collusive compromise between the parties, the facts of which showed fraud as against plaintiff's attorney, did not affect the amount of the attorney's lien. Accordingly, as the attorney had a contract with plaintiff for one half of the amount that might be obtained, and after the recovery of a verdict for $3,000, the client settled for $700, it was held that the attorney could recover from the defendant, $1,500.

As to effect of fact that compromise was tainted with such fraud and undue influence as would have entitled the client to have it set aside, see Stephens v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 656, 138 S. W. 904, cited infra, II. a, 8.

7. Effect of opponent's agreement to pay attorney.

Where the defendant settles the case by paying the client a sum of money and agreeing with the client that he will also pay his attorney, a question arises which, while apparently simple, has created considerable conflict of opinion. All of the cases doubtless recognize the rule that the amount for which the parties have in good faith agreed to settle is binding on the attorney, but they disagree as to what this amount is. The view that the amount paid the client is the amount on which the attorney's percentage is to be computed has been adopted and reaffirmed after full consideration in Kentucky, and is also apparently accepted in Iowa, New York, and Texas, and is supported to some extent by a Tennessee case dealing with an analogous question. Rickel v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1900) 112 Iowa, 148, 83 N. W. 957; Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. (1909) 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 3 A.L.R.—31.

776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114; PROCTER v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 461; Pilkington v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1900) 49 App. Div. 22, 63 N. Y. Supp. 211, 30 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 276; Neu v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1906) 118 App. Div. 446, 99 N. Y. Supp. 290 (citing Pilkington Case); Sargent v. McLeod (1913) 155 App. Div. 21, 139 N. Y. Supp. 666, reversed on another ground in (1913) 209 N. Y. 360, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 380, 103 N. E. 164; Sidoway v. Jones (1912) 125 Tenn. 322, 143 S. W. 893; Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Marshall (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 643.

The view prevailing in Illinois, Minnesota, and Missouri is that the agreement to pay the attorney is a part of the settlement, that the amount paid the client is not the whole of the settlement, but only the client's share thereof, and that the whole amount of the settlement on which the attorney's percentage is to be computed is an amount bearing such a proportion to the amount paid to the client as the whole bears to the fraction representing the client's share. Sutton v. Chicago R. Co. (1913) 258 Ill. 551, 101 N. E. 940, reversing (1912) 174 Ill. App. 316; Malmquist v. Belden Mfg. Co. (1915) 202 Ill. App. 319; Johnson v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 128 Minn. 365, L.R.A.1917B, 1140, 151 N. W. 125; Curtis v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1906) 118 Mo. App. 341, 94 S. W. 762, s. c. on subsequent appeal (1907) 125 Mo. App. 369, 102 S. W. 82; Boyd v. G. W. Chase & Son Mercantile Co. (1909) 135 Mo. App. 115, 115 S. W. 1052; Mytton v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1917) — Mo. App. —, 198 S. W. 189. And see 2 Thornton, Attys. § 457.

In Sutton v. Chicago R. Co. (1913) 258 Ill. 551, 101 N. E. 940, reversing (1912) 174 Ill. App. 316, supra, the supreme court of Illinois said: "In case of a settlement, the only right that an attorney with such a contract has is to insist that his lien attach to the amount agreed to be paid his client in the settlement. . . . The agreement on the part of appellee to pay the fee of appellant was just as much a part of the consideration for the release by Speicher of his claim against appellee as the cash which was paid him, and that, together with the cash paid, represented the full amount of the settlement. The lien of appellant attached to the whole amount represented by this settlement agreement, and under his contract he was entitled to one half of the same."

In Curtis v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 125 Mo. App. 369, 102 S. W. 62, the Kansas City court of appeals said: "As long as the parties acted in good faith, the defendant, at the risk of having to pay the attorneys' fee twice, because of the lien which attached to the judgment, could agree with plaintiff to pay her the entire proceeds of the settlement, and depend on her to pay her lawyers their fee. And, had it been the understanding that the payment of $200, made to plaintiff, was to include the amount due them, we would have no hesitation in saying that her failure to pay the fee would give to the attorneys no other lien, under the statute, than one for the security of a fee of $100. In such case, the payment to plaintiff would include the entire proceeds of the settlement, and would fix the standard by which the fee should be measured. But that was not the settlement made in this case. Defendant, knowing that the attorneys had a lien on the judgment obtained by their client, made the settlement on the distinct understanding that the sum of $200 which they paid plaintiff did not include the fee of her attorneys or any part thereof, and agreed with her, in addition to the amount paid her, to discharge the lien of the attorneys. In other words, as part of the settlement, they agreed to pay her attorneys the amount the latter were entitled to receive under the contract of employment. And, under this agreement, the proceeds of the settlement received by plaintiff were composed of the sum of $200 in cash paid to her, and the promise of defendant to pay her lawyers. Defendant thereby assumed the burden of discharging plaintiff's obligation as fixed by the terms of the contract of employment, and the extent thereof is not affected by the erroneous assumption of the parties that the fee of the attorneys was limited to one half of the cash payment made to plaintiff. The contract required that the fee should equal the amount of plaintiff's share of the proceeds of any settlement, and should we say that defendant could pay plaintiff $200 as her share of the proceeds and discharge the attorneys' lien on the payment of $100 to the attorneys, we would arbitrarily, and without any legal justification, change the terms of the contract by giving to the attorneys, not one half of the proceeds, but only one third thereof."

The arguments in support of the opposite view must be sought in the Kentucky cases, as none of the other cases discussed the question at length. These arguments are apparently two. First, it is said (Schmitz v. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. (1909) 131 Ky. 207, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 776, 114 S. W. 1197, 18 Ann. Cas. 1114, supra) that "the amount of the attorney's recovery depended entirely upon the amount recovered by his client. He was to get a share or interest in whatever amount his client received, and hence, in determining what the attorney was entitled to, we must of necessity ascertain what the client secured, as the attorney is only entitled to one half of that amount." The obvious answer to this is that the Kentucky rule gives the attorney only one half of the cash received, but the client has received in addition to this a discharge of his indebtedness to his attorney. If the client, instead of receiving any cash, had contracted with the defendant to pay other debts owing by the client, would it be argued that the client had received nothing? The second argument is more difficult. It is that the obligation of the defendant was to pay to the attorney the fees the client would have to pay, no more and no less; and the court adds: "Suppose the company had been insolvent and the attorney could not recover from it any part of his fee, how much could he have recovered from his client?" In the Curtis Case (Mo.) supra, this same question was put to the court by counsel, but the court's answer is hardly satisfactory. The court said: "The clandestine agreement of plaintiff and defendant to settle their controversy did not absolve plaintiff from her obligation to her attorneys under the contract of employment, and if she chose to accept the promise of an insolvent for a part of the proceeds of that settlement, she assumed the risk of the failure of her promisor to pay. She could no more require her lawyers to share in that risk than she could compel them to accept the whole of it in consideration of their demand against her. In the case supposed, as in the one actually before us, the proceeds of the settlement would consist of the sum of the amount of the cash payment and the amount covered by the promise, and the attorneys would be entitled to recover from their client one half of the total sum."

If the court means that the attorney could recover from the client the entire amount paid to the client, leaving the client to take the entire risk of collecting the balance of the settlement, it is difficult to believe that such holding would meet with general approval. The court also appears to overlook the fact that the attorney already was sharing in the risk of the client's inability to collect anything from the defendant, and that such risk was not increased by the settlement. It is, however, unnecessary to go to this length to meet the objection made by the Kentucky court. Whether the defendant was solvent or insolvent, if the attorney sued the client, it would appear proper to limit his recovery to the agreed percentage of the amount paid the client, not because his fee would be measured by the cash payment, but because he should not be permitted to collect the balance of the fee until the client collected the balance of the settlement. But no such reason exists for so limiting the recovery in an action against the defendant, as the very object of the action is to collect the balance of the settlement.

One objection to which the Missouri rule is open is that it results in computing the attorney's percentage on a sum larger than the amount which the parties had in mind when making the settlement; but, as said in Curtis v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 125 Mo. App. 369, 102 S. W. 62, this merely results from the fact that the parties put a wrong legal construction on the contract of employment. If, however, the defendant, instead of agreeing to discharge the attorney's lien, had paid the client $200, and agreed to pay $100 on account of her attorney's fee, the net proceeds of the settlement would have been $300, and the amount of the attorney's lien would have been one half of that sum. This would be for the reason that the client could, in good faith, settle the entire cause of action for any amount he chose to accept. Ibid. But see Boyd v. G. W. Chase & Son Mercantile Co. (1909) 135 Mo. App. 115, 115 S. W. 1052 (discussed below), where this suggestion appears to have been repudiated by the same court.

The rule also seems open to the criticism that, in refusing to extend it to cases in which the defendant pays the entire amount of the settlement to the client, knowing that the law will compel him to pay an additional sum to the attorneys, and doubtless intending, though not promising, to do so, the court is making a distinction where there is no real difference (Czecziotka v. Hammond Glue Co. (1914) 185 Ill. App. 559; Case v. Emerson-Brantingham Co. (1915) 269 Ill. 94, 109 N. E. 671, affirming (1915) 195 Ill. App. 209; Whitcotton v. St. Louis & H. R. Co. (1913) 250 Mo. 624, 157 S. W. 776). Thus, in Case v. Emerson-Brantingham Co. (1915) 269 Ill. 94, 109 N. E. 671, affirming (1915) 195 Ill. App. 209, supra, the defendant, after paying the whole amount of the settlement to the client, apparently made a prompt and voluntary offer to pay an amount equal to one half thereof to the attorney. As a matter of law, it is doubtless true, as stated by the court, that defendant's failure to withhold one half of the proceeds of the settlement was not controlling in determining the amount of the attorney's fee, but merely made the defendant liable to pay such one half over again; but the failure to withhold any part of the proceeds of the settlement, in connection with the other facts stated, would seem to make a question of fact as to whether the actual agreement between the parties did not contemplate that the attorney would be paid by the defendant.

It seems that if a client's release of the defendant contains an agreement that the consideration therein stated is the sole consideration of the release, and that the consideration is contractual, and not a mere recital, the attorney is limited to one half of the amount recited in the release, and cannot show by oral testimony that the defendant agreed with the client to pay his attorney. Hurr v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1910) 141 Mo. App. 217, 124 S. W. 1057.

But where the agreement to pay the attorney's fee was excluded from the written compromise agreement for the purpose of defrauding the attorney, he might show the real agreement, and recover his fee under such agreement, and the evidence was not excluded by the parol-evidence rule. Mytton v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1917) — Mo. App. —, 198 S. W. 189.

Where the attorney was to receive 35 per cent of the cause of action, and the client settled for $2,000, the defendant also agreeing to pay any sum that she might be compelled to pay to her attorney, it was error to add to the $2,000, 35 per cent of that amount, making an aggregate of $2,700, and then compute the attorney's percentage on that amount. The court should have ascertained the amount of which $2,000 constituted 65 per cent, and awarded the attorney 35 per cent of that amount. Boyd v. G. W. Chase & Son Mercantile Co. (1909) 135 Mo. App. 115, 115 S. W. 1052. This seems to be a proper application of the Missouri rule, but this case involved the settlement of two actions, and in the second action (in which the attorney was to receive 40 per cent) the defendant paid the client $1,800, and agreed to pay her any amount that she should be required to pay to her attorney, "not to exceed 40 per cent of the amount paid to her, to wit, the sum of $720." The court, however, applied the same rule to this settlement, saying that the attempt to limit the attorney's fee was not binding on the attorney. It did not, of course, limit the attorney's fee to $720, but it would seem as if it did limit it to 40 per cent of $2,520, as the parties agreed to settle for an amount not to exceed this sum.

Where an attorney was employed to recover and clear the title to land, for which he was to receive a sum equal to one third of what he might recover or clear the title to, the land being estimated to be of the value of $1.50 an acre, and the defendants settled with the client for $500, and assumed and agreed to settle the attorney's fee, it was held in Bowser v. Patrick (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1578, 65 S. W. 824, that the same rule should apply as in case of the attorney's discharge, and that the attorney was entitled to reasonable compensation for the services actually rendered up to the time of the compromise, to be allowed at the contract price, abated by such sum as was reasonably represented by the unperformed part of the labor; that the amount paid the client was not material to the question, since, when defendants agreed to pay the attorney, and obtained a conveyance of the land, the measure of their liability was the reasonable fee of the attorney, and not the amount paid the client. A recovery of $900 was therefore upheld, it appearing that 1,800 acres were involved in the controversy, and that the attorneys, by their vigilance, had, through an injunction, saved to the client timber worth $3,000.

8. Settlement after judgment.

Where the settlement is made after judgment, the cases are not entirely harmonious, but they support the rule that if the judgment is final, the amount of the judgment, and not the amount of the settlement, controls, at least, where the defendant is solvent. Flint v. Hubbard (1901) 16 Colo. App. 464, 66 Pac. 446; Coker v. Oliver (1908) 4 Ga. App. 728, 62 S. E. 483; Chreste v. Louisville R. Co. (1915) 167 Ky. 75, L.R.A.1917B, 1123, 180 S. W.

49, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 867; Waite v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1907) 204 Mo. 491, 103 S. W. 60; Stephens v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 656, 138 S. W. 904; Serwer v. Serwer (1904) 91 App. Div. 538, 86 N. Y. Supp. 838.

And in Serwer v. Serwer (1904) 91 App. Div. 538, 86 N. Y. Supp. 838, supra, it was held that the court had no power to reduce the amount of the attorney's fee, though the defendant was financially irresponsible, and the client was in needy circumstances and anxious to accept an offer of settlement made by the defendant's brothers, but which was conditional upon the discharge of the attorney's lien.

So, in Coker v. Oliver (1908) 4 Ga. App. 728, 62 S. E. 483, where the client accepted corporate stock in full settlement of the judgment, it was held that he was liable to the attorney for the full amount of the attorney's fee (apparently meaning the agreed percentage of the face of the judgment, with interest), and that evidence of the real value of the property taken in payment of the judgment was immaterial. The court said that a client who made a settlement without the consent of the attorney would be presumed to have collected the claim in full, and to have received such a settlement as was as satisfactory to him as payment in full. The court, however, does not seem to attach much importance to the fact that there had been a judgment. It should be noted, however, that the action was one on notes, and not one for unliquidated damages.

In Flint v. Hubbard (1901) 16 Colo. App. 464, 66 Pac. 446, the court lays stress on the fact that the settlement was collusive and fraudulent.

But where the judgment has not become final, as where an appeal or a motion for a new trial is pending, the amount of the settlement, and not the amount of the judgment, controls as a general rule. Nichols v. Orr (1917) — Colo. —, 2 A.L.R. 449, 166 Pac. 561; Wait v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1907) 204 Mo. 491, 103 S. W. 60; Boyle v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1908) 134 Mo. App. 71, 114 S. W. 558;

Stephens v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 656, 138 S. W. 904; Corcoran v. George Kellogg Structural Co. (1917) 179 App. Div. 396, 166 N. Y. Supp. 269.

And this is true, though the defendant was guilty of such fraud and undue influence in procuring the settlement as would entitle the client to have it set aside, where he has not sought to have it set aside, but by his inaction has ratified the settlement. Stephens v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 656, 138 S. W. 904.

In Corcoran v. George Kellogg Structural Co. (1917) 179 App. Div. 396, 166 N. Y. Supp. 269, supra, the client, apparently as a mere step in making the settlement, discharged the attorneys, and there are some remarks in the opinion which seem to indicate that the court thought that the attorneys were only entitled to recover the value of their services, and not the contingent fee; but as the defendant had retained the attorneys' share of the settlement, and did not deny their right to recover that amount, such remarks were apparently obiter.

But where there was no pretense that the defendant in the action was irresponsible, or that there was any likelihood that the judgment recovered against him would have been reversed on appeal, it was held that the amount of the judgment controlled, though the settlement was made while an appeal was pending. Baxter v. Connor (1907) 119 App. Div. 450, 39 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 363, 104 N. Y. Supp. 327. The court said: "If, after a judgment has been duly recovered for a substantial amount, to be equally divided between attorney and client by lawful agreement, the party in whose favor it has been obtained is at liberty to negotiate with the judgment debtor and to cancel the judgment for a nominal consideration, limiting his attorney to a fractional part of the nominal sum by way of compensation, it is difficult to see any beneficial object accomplished by the statute [the Attorneys' Lien Statute]. The freedom of a plaintiff to compromise his claim and to settle with his adversary, notwithstanding the existence of an attorney's lien, has often been judicially declared, and many cases are cited by the learned counsel for the appellant. They have little or no application here because none of them relates to a case of settlement, privately effected after judgment."

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Proctor (1899) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 447, 51 S. W. 591, the amount of the judgment was held to control, though the court said that the case was prepared for appeal before the settlement was made. The judgment in that case provided that the attorney should have a lien thereon for a reasonable attorney's fee, but it is difficult to see how this could have any greater force than a statutory provision to the same effect.

In many cases, the contract between the attorney and client provides that the attorney shall receive a specified percentage of the amount recovered, by judgment, compromise, or otherwise; or some other words are used which are broad enough to include a compromise. It should be noted, however, that such a contract undoubtedly contemplates a compromise made by mutual consent of the attorney and client, and not a compromise made by the client without the attorney's knowledge or consent. Most of the cases appear to attach no importance to the presence or absence of such language, and it was expressly held in Gillespie v. American Car & Foundry Co. (1917) — Mo. App. —, 194 S. W. 1064, that, though the contract did not, in terms, make any provision for a compromise by the client, the attorneys were entitled to receive the specified percentage of the amount for which the client compromised the claim. The contract in that case provided that the attorneys should have 50 per cent of the entire amount sued for, in case they were able to compromise and collect the claim before judgment, and that in case the claim was not compromised or settled, but was prosecuted to judgment, they should have 50 per cent of the full amount of the judgment.

In two other cases, however, the courts have refused to measure the attorney's compensation by the amount of the settlement, because the contract did not contemplate a settlement by the client. Duke v. Harper (1880) 8 Mo. App. 296; Levy v. Public Service R. Co. (1918) 91 N. J. L. 183, 103 Atl. 171, affirming (1916) — N. J. L. —, 98 Atl. 847. In the New Jersey case, the contract authorized the attorney to retain 50 per cent of all moneys received by him by way of settlement, but said nothing about a settlement by the client; and the court held that the percentage contract was not involved in a proceeding to enforce the attorney's lien against the adverse party, after a settlement with the client. The court's remarks on this point are rather meager, but it apparently holds that the agreement does not control in such case, in determining the amount due the attorney. It, however, held that the amount of the lien was limited to the amount of the settlement, not because the attorney's fee was so limited, but because there could not be a lien on a claim for more than the amount of the claim, as liquidated by a settlement.

In Duke v. Harper (Mo.) supra, attorneys were employed to recover real and personal property, under an agreement that they should have one fourth of the clients' shares of the property recovered, whether by suit, or compromise, or otherwise, and that they should be the exclusive judges of what suits or proceedings were necessary or proper. The clients subsequently settled by conveying their interests to the defendant for a money consideration. It was held that the attorneys were entitled to the reasonable value of their services, and not limited, on the one hand, to the agreed percentage of the amount paid on the settlement, or entitled, on the other hand, to the agreed percentage of the amount which would have been recovered. The holding that they were not limited to the agreed percentage of the settlement was based on two grounds. The first was, that the attorneys, having taken the risk of failure, could not be also compelled to take the risk arising from the clients' voluntary act. The second was, that the compromise contemplated by the contract was one made by the attorneys, or with their consent, and that a compromise without their consent was a casus omissus, not contemplated by the contract, and not governed thereby. Neither of these reasons appears entirely consistent with the later decisions in the same jurisdiction. In support of its other conclusion, that the amount which might have been recovered did not govern, the court said: "It is true that the plaintiffs might have recovered nothing. But the happening of that contingency is out of the question, since the defendants have chosen to interfere with the contract as made, and have prevented the occurrence of the contingencies which were in the minds of the parties. Thus, as we cannot proceed upon the basis that nothing might have been recovered, so we cannot proceed upon the basis that all might have been recovered. We must simply leave the contract, since success under it was not attained; and since, from its provisions, it furnishes no test by which to determine the damages. Ordinarily, the basis on which the law proceeds is of restoring, through the medium of money damages, the aggrieved person to the position in which he would have been had the other party performed his contract. . . . But the contingencies of this contract afford no measure. . . . The plaintiffs must prove loss actually sustained, and cannot ignore uncertainties which are a part of their bargain. The law will presume they would have performed their contract, as they did, so far as allowed; but will not enter the region of conjecture and assume how much would have been recovered."

10. The rule in Oklahoma and Texas.

In Oklahoma, the statute authorizes attorneys to contract for a percentage of the proceeds of the cause of action, not exceeding 50 per cent of the amount of such judgment as may be recovered, or such compromise as may be made with the consent of the attorney, and provides that no compromise or settlement without the attorney's consent shall affect or abrogate the lien. It also provides that, when the contract is for a contingent fee and specifies the amount for which the action is to be filed, then the lien and the cause of action by the attorney against the adverse party shall be for the agreed percentage "of the amount to be sued for, as mentioned in the contract." Thereunder, it is held that the attorney's recovery against the adverse party is not limited to the specified percentage of the amount paid the client, and that the attorney may recover the specified percentage of the amount which the client would have recovered had the action proceeded to final judgment, and that, to fix this amount, the attorney may establish the merits of the client's cause of action. Herman Constr. Co. v. Wood (1912) 35 Okla. 103, 128 Pac. 309; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Williams (1913) 49 Okla. 126, 152 Pac. 395; Allen v. Shepherd (1918) — Okla. —, 169 Pac. 1115. In Herman Constr. Co. v. Wood (Okla.) supra, it was apparently contended by counsel that the attorney was entitled to recover the specified percentage of the amount for which the suit was brought, regardless of the merits of the suit. The court, however, pointed out that the statute did not authorize a contract for a percentage of the amount to be sued for, but only for a percentage "of the net amount of such judgment as may be recovered, or such compromise as may be made with the consent of the attorney;" and held that the statute meant that the attorney might sue the adverse party for an amount not to exceed the specified percentage of the amount sued for, and recover to the extent that he might show his client was entitled to recover.

An early Texas case laid down the general rule that, where an attorney contracts with a client for a definite fee contingent upon the result of the suit, and the client compromises the suit without the knowledge of the attorney, the attorney is entitled to recover the whole amount of the fee in like manner as if the contingency had transpired upon which the payment of the fee was made to depend. Hill v. Cunningham (1860) 25 Tex. 25.

While the contract in the Hill Case was not one for a percentage, the rule seems to have been regarded as applying to such fees. It was, however, held in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Eustis (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 350, 28 S. W. 227, that the rule stated only applies, where the evidence fails to show what would have been the result of the litigation, had there been no compromise; and where such rule does not apply, the amount recoverable is apparently governed by the amount which would have been recovered had the suit been prosecuted to final judgment. Ibid.; Lynch v. Munson (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 59 S. W. 603, on rehearing (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 61 S. W. 140; St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Thomas (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 784.

Thus, in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Eustis (Tex.) supra, it was apparently held that the attorney could not recover, where it appeared that the case would have been decided against the client if prosecuted to final judgment.

And where the client employed the attorney to bring an action on a guardian's bond, and for his services assigned him one half of the amount to be realized, and thereafter dismissed the suit in consideration of the payment of a nominal sum, it was held that the attorney was not entitled to recover one half of the amount sued for on behalf of the client, but only one half of the amount which would have been realized, and that it was necessary for him to show the client's right of recovery and the solvency of the defendant. Lynch v. Munson (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 59 S. W. 603, on rehearing. (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 61 S. W. 140. The court, however, places this holding, to a considerable extent, on the ground that there was no personal liability of the client under the contract, and that his liability arose only from his destruction of the attorney's right to prosecute the claim to the extent of his interest.

And where the client employed attorneys to bring an action for damages, and for their services assigned to them a one-half interest in the cause of action, it was held that a settlement by the client, to which the attorneys were not parties, affected only the client's one-half interest; and that the attorneys could, notwithstanding the settlement, prosecute the suit to a conclusion for the one-half interest assigned to them, and were not limited to, or compelled to accept, one half of the amount for which the client settled. St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Thomas (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 784.

But in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ginther (1903) 96 Tex. 295, 72 S. W. 166, affirming (1902) 30 Tex. Civ. App. 161, 70 S. W. 96, it was held that a contract between attorney and client, whereby the client agreed to give and assign to the attorney one third of whatever might be recovered in a contemplated suit, or by way of compromise, was not merely an agreement for a contingent fee, but an assignment of an interest in the fund, when recovered. Accordingly, where the client compromised, pending the suit, for $2,500, and the attorneys intervened and sought and obtained judgment for one third of the amount paid to the client, the judgment in their favor was affirmed. This case is distinguished in St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Thomas (Tex.) supra, on the ground that the assignment was of one third of whatever might be recovered in the suit, or by way of compromise.

And where the client assigned to the attorney a one-half interest in the case, and, pending the action, the defendant fraudulently settled with the client and transported him outside the state, and concealed his whereabouts from the attorney, the attorney, though entitled to prosecute the client's suit to judgment in his own interest, and to the extent of his interest, was not restricted to that remedy, but might recover from the defendant one half of the amount paid the client in settlement of the client's claim. The transfer of part of the cause of action entitled the assignee to that proportion of the fruits or proceeds of the cause of action, without so specifying. Defendant not only deprived the attorney of evidence which was indispensable to him in prosecuting the cause of action, but also destroyed his ability to arrive at the amount of damages which would have been fixed upon a successful result of the suit, and the only measure of damages left open was that fixed by the defendant by his own settlement. Powell v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 975.

Cases in which the client, after dismissing the suit, brings a new action by another attorney, in which there is a recovery, in which the displaced attorney claims a right to participate, have not been included.

This subdivision includes only cases in which there was a percentage contract. For other cases, involving a discontinuance or dismissal of the action by the client, see the following subdivision.

As a general rule, an attorney employed on a percentage contract is entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services, where the action is voluntarily discontinued or dismissed by the client without his consent. Simrall v. Morton (1890) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 31, 12 S. W. 185; Carbajal's Succession (1916) 139 La. 481, 71 So. 774; Badger v. Mayer (1894) 8 Misc. 533, 59 N. Y. S. R. 398, 28 N. Y. Supp. 765; Yuells v. Hyman (1903) 84 N. Y. Supp. 460; Clark v. Nichols (1908) 127 App. Div. 219, 111 N. Y. Supp. 66; ANDREWES v. HAAS (reported herewith) ante, 458, affirming (1913) 160 App. Div. 421, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1060; Thole v. Martino (1914) 56 Pa. Super. Ct. 371.

And though the statute provides that a contract for a contingent fee may contain a stipulation that neither attorney nor client shall settle, compromise, or discontinue without the consent of the other, if the contract contains no such stipulation, the client can discontinue or compromise at will, leaving the attorney to his remedy by an action on quantum meruit for the services rendered. Carbajal's Succession (1916) 139 La. 481, 71 So. 774.

Where, after a trial resulting in a disagreement by the jury, the clients refuse to proceed further with the litigation, the attorneys can sue for the reasonable value of their services. Yuells v. Hyman (1903) 84 N. Y. Supp. 460.

And where attorneys were employed to collect claims against a city for a percentage of the amount received in settlement of the claims, and the client thereafter filed an affidavit with the city comptroller, asserting his desire to withdraw the claims, and declaring that they were for a larger amount of damages than he had actually suffered, the attorneys were entitled to withdraw from the cause, and recover upon a quantum meruit for the value of the services rendered. Clark v. Nichols (1908) 127 App. Div. 219, 111 N. Y. Supp. 66.

And where an attorney was employed to render services in surcharging a guardian's account, for 50 per cent of any credit claimed by the guardian and disallowed by the court, and the client subsequently withdrew his objections and exceptions to the account, the attorney was allowed to recover upon a quantum meruit, over the objection that he could not recover because there was no basis for computing the 50 per cent provided in the contract. Thole v. Martino (1914) 56 Pa. Super. Ct. 371.

The dismissal of a suit to set aside deeds, brought by an attorney under a contract giving him one fourth of any land decreed to be owned by the client, does not give the attorney a right of action against the client for one fourth of the value of the land, whatever other right of recovery it may give him. McPhail v. Spore (1916) 62 Colo. 307, 162 Pac. 151.

The attorney cannot recover the agreed percentage of the amount which would have been recovered if the action had proceeded. ANDREWES v. HAAS (reported herewith) ante, 458, affirming (1913) 160 App. Div. 421, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1060.

If litigation against a railroad company is abandoned with the consent of the attorneys, because regarded by them as hopeless, they are not entitled to recover anything, though after such abandonment the client becomes a member of a syndicate which purchases the railroad. Simrall v. Morton (1890) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 31, 12 S. W. 185.

In Seasegood v. Prager (1911) 146 App. Div. 833, 131 N. Y. Supp. 771, reversing (1911) 70 Misc. 490, 127 N. Y. Supp. 482, it was held that a client's absence when his case was called for trial, resulting in a dismissal, when due to a mistake, did not entitle his attorney, employed on a contingent fee consisting of a percentage of the recovery, to withdraw from the case and recover on a quantum meruit.

In some jurisdictions, however, the attorney's compensation is apparently measured by the amount which would have been recovered. Swinnerton v. Monterey County (1888) 76 Cal. 113, 18 Pac. 135; Williams v. Philadelphia (1904) 208 Pa. 282, 57 Atl. 578; Wilbur v. Lane (1909) 53 Tex. Civ. App. 249, 115 S. W. 298. And see Evans v. Bell (1838) 6 Dana (Ky.) 479, and Sullivan v. McCann (1908) 124 App. Div. 126, 108 N. Y. Supp. 909.

Thus, an attorney employed by a county to bring actions against tax collectors for commissions unlawfully retained was held not entitled to anything as damages for the county's breach of the contract by dismissing the actions, where no commissions were illegally retained, and nothing could have been recovered if the actions had been prosecuted to judgment. Swinnerton v. Monterey County (1888) 76 Cal. 113, 18 Pac. 135.

And where the client fails to attend the trial, resulting in a dismissal of the action, it was held that the attorney could not recover without showing that a judgment would have been recovered if the action had been tried. Wilbur v. Lane (1909) 53 Tex. Civ. App. 249, 115 S. W. 298.

And where a city employed an attorney to prosecute claims against the state for overpayments of taxes, for 10 per cent of the credits which might be secured, and, after certain credits had been secured, the city officials refused to permit him to prosecute further claims, by refusing to verify the statements of the claims, or to furnish him necessary information, because of their belief that if the accounts were opened there would be more debits against the city than credits in its favor, the attorney was held entitled to recover 10 per cent of the amount for which it was reasonably probable credit would have been obtained. Williams v. Philadelphia (1904) 208 Pa. 282, 57 Atl. 578. The court said: "Where the contract is to perform something in the future, the successful result of which is, therefore, necessarily uncertain, and performance is wrongfully prevented by the other party, a speculative element is unavoidably introduced into the question of damages, but cannot take away the right to just compensation. In such cases, all that can be reasonably required of a plaintiff is to produce to the jury sufficient evidence of the best character attainable, of a fair prospect of success, and the compensation which would have followed." The court, however, approved an instruction telling the jury that if the evidence as to the probable success of the attorney was so based on conjecture and speculation that it did not afford sufficient certainty to the jury's mind to reach a conclusion, then they should resort to the value of the services actually rendered, without regard to the contingent fee.

In Evans v. Bell (1838) 6 Dana (Ky.) 479, the attorney was employed to bring an action for slander, for one tenth of the damages recoverable. The client either compromised the suit, or dismissed it without any compromise (the case is not very clear on this point), and the attorney sued for a fee of $30. It was apparently held that he could not recover on the contract of the client at all, because nothing had been recovered, and, according to client's testimony, nothing could have been recovered. It was, however, held that, if the client induced him to take the case on such terms by a false representation of the facts, the attorney might treat the contract as a nullity, and recover the value of his services upon an implied promise to pay therefor.

In Sullivan v. McCann (1908) 124 App. Div. 126, 108 N. Y. Supp. 909, attorneys were employed to bring all necessary proceedings to enforce the rights or protect the interests of the clients in their father's estate, for 12½ per cent of any amount which they should recover, or be entitled to; or, in case of settlement or adjustment, 12½ per cent of the amount which they would be entitled to or would recover, except for such settlement and adjustment. An action brought by them was discontinued by the clients without any money being paid, or agreed to be paid; but it appeared that a provision in their father's will for an accumulation of income had been held void in another action, and that they would have recovered their proportion of the accumulated income. The attorneys were held entitled to recover 12½ per cent of the amount of the income which they would have recovered.

III. Definite fees contingent upon success.

In connection with percentage fees, it was found necessary to treat the question of dismissal separately from the question of compromise; but in connection with contracts of the character discussed in this subdivision, there is little, if any, difference in the rules applicable, and settlements and dismissals are treated together.

Where the contract is not for a percentage of the recovery, but for a specified fee contingent upon success, there is a conflict of opinion as to the proper measure of recovery. One class of cases apparently holds that the attorney is entitled to recover the whole fee. Few of the cases in this class are late cases, and some of them appear to be somewhat ambiguous. The other class of cases holds that the attorney is only entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services. These cases will be considered first.

Illinois.—Pratt v. Kerns (1905) 123 Ill. App. 86.

Iowa.—Ellwood v. Wilson (1866) 21 Iowa, 523.

Minnesota.—SOUTHWORTH v. ROSENDAHL (reported herewith) ante, 468.

Montana.—Harris v. Root (1903) 28 Mont. 159, 72 Pac. 429; Foley v. Kleinschmidt (1903) 28 Mont. 198, 72 Pac. 432.

New York.—Carey v. Gnant (1871) 59 Barb. 574; Haire v. Hughes (1908) 127 App. Div. 530, 111 N. Y. Supp. 892, affirmed in (1909) 197 N. Y. 514, 90 N. E. 1159.

Philippine.—Montinola v. Hoflena (1909) 13 Philippine, 339.

West Virginia.—Polsley v. Anderson (1874) 7 W. Va. 202, 23 Am. Rep. 613; Tomlinson v. Polsley (1888) 31 W. Va. 108, 5 S. E. 457.

The whole amount of the fee may, however, be recovered, on proof that the services were reasonably worth that sum, but not where the evidence shows that the value of the attorney's services bore no just proportion to the amount of the fee. Pratt v. Kerns (1905) 123 Ill. App. 86.

In SOUTHWORTH v. ROSENDAHL (reported herewith) ante, 468, it is held that the attorney cannot recover a percentage of the amount for which the case is settled, though the parties, when making the contract, agreed that the property involved in the action was worth a specified sum.

But in Marsh v. Holbrook (1869) 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 577, note, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 176, the court upheld a recovery for a sum bearing the same proportion to the agreed fee that the amount of the settlement bore to the amount which would have been recovered in case of complete success. The judge writing the principal opinion said that the rule was, that, where performance was arrested and prevented by the act or omission of one party, the other had the election to treat the contract as rescinded, and recover on a quantum meruit, or to sue upon the contract and recover for what had been done, at the stipulated price, and for the loss in profits, or otherwise, sustained. That case is distinguished in Carey v. Gnant (1871) 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 574, on the ground that in that case the client, in reality, succeeded, and received almost the whole claim, and said that where a recovery was doubtful, the attorney was only entitled to be paid for his services to the time of the settlement. The court held, however, that the amount agreed upon for all the services to be rendered might form the measure of damages, in proportion to the services rendered. The court said: "The contract did not require the defendant to continue the litigation at all events, and even if it did, it is very doubtful whether the plaintiff could claim the whole sum, if the contract was broken. . . . If it should appear that the defendant could in no event recover, he would not, under the contract, be required to continue a useless litigation, and it would be equally unjust to require him to pay to the plaintiff the sum agreed upon as compensation in the event of success." This was an ejectment action, and before trial the parties compromised the case.

In Harris v. Root (1903) 28 Mont. 159, 72 Pac. 429, the court held that an attorney, employed in a will contest for a specified fee in case the will was defeated and his clients should receive their shares, was not entitled to recover the stipulated fee, where the parties made a favorable compromise with his assistance. The court said that the attorney had no authority to compromise the suit by virtue of his original retainer, and that, when this authority was conferred upon and accepted by him, there was a mutual abandonment of the contract, and he could only recover upon a quantum meruit. The court further said that the case would have been no different had the compromise been effected without the aid or consent of the attorney, and that where the stipulation was for a contingent fee, no matter whether the rendering of the services was prevented by the client, or by circumstances over which he had no control, the measure of recovery by the attorney was the value of the services actually rendered, and not the amount of the stipulated fee. But see Ingersoll v. Coram (1908) 211 U. S. 335, 53 L. ed. 208, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, involving the same contract, in which the court held that the contingency upon which the fee was payable was satisfied where, by the compromise, the clients received a larger proportion of the estate than if the testator had died intestate (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

Where a party retained an attorney to prosecute the necessary proceedings to vacate the probate of a will and procure the probate of a later will, and, for his compensation, assigned to him a share of his legacy or devise to the extent of $10,000, and it was apparent that the assignment was dependent on the vacation of the probate of the earlier will and the admission to probate of the later will, but, without the consent of the attorney, a compromise was made, whereby the estate was distributed independent of the wills, it was held that the attorney was not entitled to the agreed amount, whatever his right might be upon a quantum meruit. Haire v. Hughes (1908) 127 App. Div. 530, 111 N. Y. Supp. 892, affirmed in (1909) 197 N. Y. 514, 90 N. E. 1159.

And where an attorney was employed to defend two actions pending against a client, and was to be paid a specified sum and an additional sum in case the decision was in favor of the client, both parties contemplating that it would be necessary to take the case to the supreme court, but, after a decision in one of the cases in favor of the client by the trial court, the parties compromised, it was held that the attorney could not recover the contingent fee specified in the contract, but only reasonable compensation for the services rendered. Montinola v. Hofilena (1909) 13 Philippine, 339. The court said that the contract was made in contemplation of a state of facts which never arose, and that there was no agreement as to the compensation in the contingency which occurred.

As stated above, some of the cases apparently take the view that the whole fee may be recovered. Hunt v. Test (1845) 8 Ala. 713, 42 Am. Dec. 59; Hall v. Gunter (1908) 157 Ala. 375, 47 So. 155; Baldwin v. Bennett (1854) 4 Cal. 392; Whitehead v. Duck- er (1848) 11 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 98; McElhinney v. Kline (1878) 6 Mo. App. 94; Hill v. Cunningham (1860) 25 Tex. 25. And see also Ingersoll v. Coram, 211 U. S. 335, 53 L. ed. 208, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, cited supra (see also Rose's Notes to this case), and Marsh v. Holbrook (1869) 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 577, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 176, where two of the judges expressed the opinion that the attorney was entitled to recover the whole contract price, though this point was not decided, as the attorney had not complained of the measure of damages adopted by the trial court.

In Baldwin v. Bennett (1854) 4 Cal. 392, the court apparently upheld the attorney's contention that he was entitled to the agreed fee, notwithstanding a compromise. The court said that the general measure of damages for breach of a contract was the value of the services rendered, that the rule applied to the damage sustained by the refusal to allow performance, but that where, from the nature of the contract, no possible mode was left of ascertaining the damage, the only measure of damages which could be adopted was the price agreed to be paid; that otherwise justice would be defeated and parties encouraged to violate their contracts, and that defendant not only broke his contract, but deprived the attorney of the opportunity of showing the amount of injury under the general rule. A judgment for the attorney was affirmed, but it does not clearly appear that the amount of the judgment was the amount of the stipulated fee.

In McElhinney v. Kline (1878) 6 Mo. App. 94, a person expecting to be ousted from land in a pending ejectment action employed an attorney to bring an action for breach of covenant against his grantor. After some work had been done by the attorney, the client compromised the ejectment action by purchasing the outstanding interest without consulting the attorney, and thus prevented the bringing of the action for breach of covenant. The court held the attorney entitled to the full sum of $200, which was to be paid for bringing the action in case of success, saying that it was by the act of the client, and not by the non-occurrence of any contingency contemplated by the contract, that the attorney was prevented from performing the agreed services; that it was to be assumed that the services would have been performed as agreed upon; that the damages sustained by the refusal were measured by the price fixed by the contract; that where an attorney was thus retained for a particular case, and did work, and was discharged without fault on his part, it would seem that the only measure of damages was the price agreed to be paid; and that the nature of the engagement exempted the case from the rule by which the contract price, in ordinary cases of services, was merely prima facie evidence.

In one of the cases cited above it was proved or found that the services were reasonably worth the contract price (Hall v. Gunter (1908) 157 Ala. 375, 47 So. 155).

In Hunt v. Test (1845) 8 Ala. 713, 42 Am. Dec. 659, it was held that, if the attorney consented to the compromise, he was entitled only to the value of the services actually rendered, as measured by the contract; his consent amounting to a rescission of the contract, which, however, must be looked to for some purposes; and that the law would not imply a promise to pay more for partial success than the attorney had considered adequate for complete success.

Where an attorney was employed to prosecute a claim to attached slaves, and the client agreed to convey one of such slaves to him if he succeeded, but not to warrant the title, and the attachment suit was compromised, it was held that the value of the client's interest in the slave, and not the value of the slave, was the basis of recovery; and that where the client had no title but a mere naked legal title, tainted with fraud (the slaves having been conveyed to her to defraud the attachment creditor), only nominal damages could be recovered. Whitehead v. Ducker (1848) 11 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 98.

Where, as the result of a compromise, the client received all that he would have received if successful in the litigation, if not more, the attorney was held entitled to the stipulated fee. Webster v. Rhodes (1910) 49 Colo. 203, 112 Pac. 324. The court also pointed out, however, that the evidence showed that such fee was reasonable compensation for the services rendered, and that, therefore, it could be recovered, though the attorney was limited to a recovery on a quantum meruit.

Where attorneys were to have $100 in any event for their services in connection with the collection of insurance policies, whether settled with or without suit, but any further fee was contingent on the recovery of more than the companies had offered to pay, so as to render the companies liable for attorneys' fees, and the client settled for an amount less than that sued for and less than the companies had offered to pay, the attorneys were entitled only to $100, and such costs as they had paid. The amount received under the settlement represented the amount recovered by virtue of the suits, the same as if they had been prosecuted to final judgment. This is for the reason that the client may settle or dismiss without consulting the attorney, and the contract between attorney and client must be considered as though it contained a provision to that effect. Davies v. Patterson (1918) — Ark. —, 205 S. W. 118.

And where an agreement, under which an attorney was employed to collect money by an attachment of rents, provided that he should be paid $250 in the event that the client should realize upon the attachment not less than $1,000, and, third persons having claimed the rents attached, the client made an agreement with them under which the client received only $573, the attorney was not entitled to the stipulated compensation, no fraud in making the compromise being shown. Though a recovery on quantum meruit was not sought, the court said that the attorney was remediless, and evidently meant to hold that the attorney could not recover at all. The court said that the word "realize" was a very broad term, and might reasonably be said to include a compromise, and that it must be presumed that it was used advisedly. Brittiner v. Gomprecht (1899) 28 Misc. 218, 29 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 300, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1011.

Where a contract providing for a contingent fee of $3,000 further provided that, if the client should notify the attorney of its intention not to further prosecute the suit, it would pay him $50 a day for his services, $3,000 was the limit of the client's liability under the $50-a-day clause. Elliot v. Rubel (1890) 132 Ill. 9, 23 N. E. 400, reversing (1889) 80 Ill. App. 62.

Where an attorney was employed to prepare the necessary papers and take the necessary legal steps to have the client appointed administrator of his debtor's estate, for which he was to be paid $100 out of the estate if the administration was obtained, otherwise nothing, and, after he performed the contemplated services, the client abandoned his purpose of obtaining administration, and adopted another method of collecting his debt, it was held in Sulzbacher v. Wilkinson (1881) 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 555, that the attorney was entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services.

In Riou v. Fraser (1909) Rap. Jud. Quebec 37 C. S. 1, it was held that an agreement to pay an advocate bringing an action a sum in addition to the fee allowed by the tariff in case of success, and to pay double that sum if the client should revoke the advocate's authority before termination of the proceedings, was lawful, and the double sum recoverable, where the client revoked the advocate's authority, and discontinued the proceedings because of the death of the defendant and family considerations.

IV. Agreement not fixing amount of fee.

An attorney and client may, of course, agree that the attorney's fee shall be contingent, or, in other words, that he shall have no fee unless successful, without making any agreement as to the amount of such fee in case the attorney becomes entitled thereto. There are two cases within the scope of this note, which seem to be of this kind.

Thus, in Wright v. Wright (1876) 9 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 432, affirmed in (1877) 70 N. Y. 96, it was held that an agreement that an attorney's fee should be contingent upon recovery did not, in itself, entitle the attorney to more than the value of his services, so as to require the allowance of something more than taxable costs as a condition of discontinuance, upon a compromise between the parties.

Where the client claimed that the agreement was that he would pay the attorneys a liberal fee in case of success, and otherwise nothing but his expenses, an instruction that if the attorneys' fee was contingent upon success, and the client settled without their consent, they could recover what their services were reasonably worth, was approved. Quint v. Opher Silver Min. Co. (1868) 4 Nev. 304.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Tyler County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McCoy & Swiger, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant is not a tenant from year to year, but a tenant with a perpetual lease, or a lease for an indefinite period at his option.

Atkinson v. Orr, 83 Ga. 34, 9 S. E. 787; Penick v. Atkinson, 139 Ga. 649, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 284, 77 S. E. 1055, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 842; Myers v. Kingston Coal Co. 126 Pa. 582, 17 Atl. 891; Lewis v. Mr. William Beard for defendants in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Judgment for plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer, and defendant brings error.

The action was originally brought before a justice of the peace, and from his judgment, rendered in favor of defendant, plaintiff appealed to the circuit court. The case was there tried by the court in lieu of a jury upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that on the 14th of November, 1892, Eliza Williamson, owner of a life estate, and Cora L. Dils, owner of the remainder in fee, of a lot of ground in Sistersville, 90x115 feet, by writing under seal, leased it to J. W. and P. H. Gaffney for a period of five years, and as long thereafter as the lessees might elect to pay a rental of $50 a year semiannually in advance. The parts of the lease that are necessary to be considered in deciding the case are as follows: "The said parties of the second part (lessees) are to have said land for the purpose of building thereon two dwelling houses and to have and to hold said land for and during the term of five years, or as much longer thereafter as the parties of the second part may elect to pay the parties of the first part the sum of fifty dollars ($50) per annum, to be paid semiannually in advance. It is further agreed that the parties of the second part shall have the right at any time to sell or remove buildings placed on said premises. All the conditions between the parties hereto shall extend to their heirs, executors, and assigns."

The writing was signed and sealed by both lessors and lessees. The lessees entered and each built a dwelling house on the land, together worth from $2,500 to $4,000. J. W. Gaffney sold and assigned his interest in the lease to Mike Sexton, who occupies one of the houses. The rent has been paid semiannually in advance up until the 14th of November, 1909, when a tender of a half year's rent was made and refused. Plaintiffs then offered to make a new lease in consideration of $100 annual rental, which defendant declined, and hence this action. Mrs. Williamson died, and, later, Cora Dils also died, leaving as her heirs at law the plaintiffs, Cora, Theresa, Ruby, and Robert F. Thaw. On the 8th of April, 1910, plaintiffs gave defendant written notice to quit the premises on the 14th of November, 1910.

The terms of the lease are unambiguous and express the agreement of the parties, and according to their contract their rights must be determined, unless it contravenes some positive rule of law. The question presented for our decision is: Did the lessees have the right to extend the lease for an indefinite period after the five-year term had ended, by paying the stipulated yearly rental semiannually in advance; or was that provision which expressly gave them the right thus to extend it voidable at the election of lessors? It is argued by counsel for defendants in error that the right to terminate is mutual, and cannot exist exclusively in favor of one party to a lease. It is claimed that the lessee's right to terminate the lease at the end of any year, by electing not to pay the rent for another in advance, gives the lessor equal right to terminate it. But that principle is applicable to estates at will, and to apply it here would defeat the contract, for the lessors expressly covenanted that the lessees might have the land as much longer than five years as they should elect to pay a rental of $50 yearly in advance. It was clearly the purpose to make the continuation of the lease, after the definite term had ended, optional with the lessees. The landlord's tenant—effect

covenant to renew the lease at the end of the term, at the election of the lessee, is a binding obligation. 1 Taylor, Land. & T. 9th ed. §§ 334, 335. The consideration for the five-year lease is not expressed in the contract, but being under seal the lease imports a valuable consideration, which is not only sufficient to support the lease for the term of years, but is also a consideration for the privilege of extending the lease thereafter from year to year. The lessees are expressly given the option to perpetuate the lease. Such covenants by the landlord are held valid in England under the common law. Hare v. Burges, 4 Kay & J. 45, 70 Eng. Reprint, 19, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 86, 3 Jur. N. S. 1294, 6 Week. Rep. 144; Copper Min. Co. v. Beach, 13 Beav. 478, 51 Eng. Reprint, 184, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 326; London v. Mitford, 14 Ves. Jr. 41, 33 Eng. Reprint, 471, 9 Revised Rep. 234. Perpetual leases are also generally recognized as valid by the courts of this country. There is nothing in the policy of our law which forbids them. In fact, our mineral leases are generally of that character, especially oil and gas leases. They are usually made for a definite number of years, and also provide that, if oil or gas is produced within the term, they are to continue as long as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced. Harness v. Eastern Oil Co. 49 W. Va. 232, 38 S. E. 662; Lowther Oil Co. v. Guffey, 52 W. Va. 88, 43 S. E. 101, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 545; and numerous other cases which it is unnecessary to cite. If an oil and gas lease may be perpetuated, why may not a lease for the surface likewise be perpetuated? The fact that the occupation and use of the ground are confined to the surface in one instance, and not wholly so limited in the other, is not sufficient reason for holding that one is perpetual and the other is not. The leading case in this country on the subject of perpetual leases is Folts v. Huntley, 7 Wend. 210, and the decision of that case has been followed in a number of the states. Warner v. Tanner, 38 Ohio St. 118; School Dist. v. Everett, 52 Mich. 314, 17 N. W. 926; Atkinson v. Orr, 83 Ga. 34, 9 S. E. 787; Lewis v. Effinger, 30 Pa. 281, and the same case again in 82 Pa. 367. The following cases also assert the same doctrine: Blackmore v. Boardman, 28 Mo. 420; Drake v. Board of Education, 208 Mo. 540, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 829, 123 Am. St. Rep. 448, 106 S. W. 650, 13 Ann. Cas. 1002; Boyle v. Peabody Heights Co. 46 Md. 625.

Courts do not favor perpetual leases, and therefore covenants to renew are generally enant is binding. 4 Kent. Com. *109; 1 Taylor, Land. & T. 9th ed. § 334; Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. § 674. "A definite covenant for the perpetual yearly renewal of a lease is not void." Hoff v. Royal Metal Furniture Co. 117 App. Div. 884, 103 N. Y. Supp. 371, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 555, 82 N. E. 1128. Although the point has not been directly passed upon by this court, the doctrine of perpetual leaseholds has been recognized in the opinions in Bowyer v. Seymour, 13 W. Va. at page 23, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 67, and in Starcher Bros. v. Duty, 61 W. Va. at page 378, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 913, 123 Am. St. Rep. 990, 56 S. E. 524. A covenant to renew perpetually does not violate the rule against perpetuities. The landlord may convey his land notwithstanding his covenant, but the covenant passes with the land, and is binding on his assignee. 1 Taylor, Land. & T. § 262.

This case differs materially from Hinton Foundry Mach. & Plumbing Co. v. Lilly Lumber Co. 73 W. Va. 477, 80 S. E. 773. That was a tenancy at will, there was no term designated in the lease; while in this case there is a definite term for years, with a covenant by the lessor to renew from year to year, at a stipulated yearly rental, so long as the lessee may elect to pay the rental in advance.

The judgment will be reversed, and judgment entered here for the defendant.

Petition for rehearing denied, January 12, 1915.

ANNOTATION.

Perpetual lease or covenant to renew lease perpetually as violation of rule against perpetuities or the suspension of the power of alienation.

The effect of express statutes against long-time leases is, of course, not within the scope of the present note, nor is it concerned with the question of construction whether a covenant to renew is to be deemed a covenant to renew perpetually.

It is not intended to include in this note cases involving oil, gas, or mineral leases which do not specifically consider the validity of a lease assailed on the ground that it creates a perpetuity. It is however a matter of common observation that the ordinary lease of this character is in effect perpetual, since it continues so long as the lessee continues to operate thereunder and pay the royalty provided for. A case upon this point is Johnson v. Armstrong (1917) 81 W. Va. 399, 94 S. E. 753, holding not to be invalid on the ground that it created a perpetuity, an oil and gas lease conveying the right to produce and market oil and gas from designated premises upon the payment of certain rentals and royalties, although no definite or specified limitation or restraint was prescribed as to the time when the right to explore would end and the license or privilege cease. The reported case (THAW v. GAFFNEY, ante, 495) is cited by the court with approval, and as authority for sustaining the validity of the lease.

Save in a single instance (Morrison v. Rossignol (Cal.) infra), it has been generally held that perpetual leases and leases containing a covenant for perpetual renewal are not violative, either of the rule against perpetuities or of statutes limiting the period during which the absolute power of alienation may be suspended.

Canada.—Alexander v. Herman (1912) 2 D. L. R. 239, 8 Ont. Week. N. 755, 21 Ont. Week. Rep. 461 (stating rule).

But see Morrison v. Rossignol (1855) 5 Cal. 64, holding that a covenant for a lease to be renewed indefinitely at the option of the lessee in fact creates a perpetuity, since it puts it in the power of one party to renew forever, and is therefore against the policy of the law.

The reason why a lease containing a covenant for perpetual renewal does not contravene the rule against perpetuities is that the covenant to renew may be taken as part of the lessee's present interest. "The rule against perpetuities," says Professor Gray (Perpetuities, § 230), "although a strict rule, is yet a practical rule. An estate for years with a perpetual covenant for renewal is, so far as questions of remoteness are concerned, substantially a fee, and as such it is regarded."

And it is obvious that a perpetual lease, or a lease containing a covenant for perpetual renewal, is not a restraint or limitation upon the power of alienation of the fee, for there are at all times persons in being who by joining can convey the fee.

It has been held that a provision for the renewal of a lease for all time to come creates a perpetuity which is against the policy of the law, and which it does not favor; hence, unless it appears from the covenants in the lease, by express terms or by clear implication, that the lessee is entitled to have the lease renewed for all time to come, a court of equity will not decree specific performance of the covenant for that purpose. Drake v. Board of Education (1907) 208 Mo. 540, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 829, 123 Am. St. Rep. 448, 106 S. W. 650, 13 Ann. Cas. 1002.

In Re Hubbell (1907) 185 Iowa, 637, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 496, 113 N. W. 512, 14 Ann. Cas. 640, supra, the court said: "A lease for any number of years, whether for 99 or 999, is not in violation of the Statute of Perpetuities, for in neither is the lesson precluded thereby from disposing of it at will nor the lessee hindered in selling or assigning the lease; and by uniting in a conveyance the lessor and lessee may freely and without restraint convey both the fee and the leasehold interest."

In Sioux City Terminal R. & Warehouse Co. v. Trust Co. of N. A. (1897) 27 C. C. A. 73, 49 U. S. App. 523, 82 Fed. 124, the question presented to the court was as to the validity of a mortgage covering a leasehold interest of the lessee under a lease for 100 years. On the theory that the lease created a vested interest, the court said that "a vested interest is not subject to the rule against perpetuities, because it is vested and by its very nature cannot be subject to a condition precedent. For this reason, reversions and vested remainders are exceptions to the rule; and leases for terms far longer than lives in being and twenty-one years are valid, both at common law and under the statute of Iowa, notwithstanding the suspension of power of the lessors to take actual possession, and to convey the property free from the lease."

The distinction, between the validity of a lease either for a long period of years or for all time, and a lease violative of the statutes against perpetuities, is made in Hope v. Gloucester (1855) 7 De G. M. & G. 647, 44 Eng. Reprint, 252, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S.

145, 2 Jur. N. S. 27, 4 Week. Rep. 138, which holds that a provision in a deed to a municipality is void as violative of the laws against perpetuities, where it provides in effect that the direct heirs of the grantor shall be entitled, upon the payment of a stated sum, to a lease of the premises conveyed for their lives, and that such provision shall extend to the nearest heirs of the grantor during all time.

It has been held that a life lease to the husband and wife does not create two life estates,—an estate for two lives in being,—and hence the creation of a succeeding life estate does not offend the statute against perpetuities, which prohibits the creation of an estate for more than two lives in being. Truitt v. Battle Creek (1919) 205 Mich. 180, 171 N. W. 338.

Where a special statute against perpetuities provides in effect that any disposition of real estate is void where the right of alienation is restrained beyond the period of the life of the owner and twenty-one years and fractions thereof, a lease is void which provides that the lessee has the option to extend it from year to year, and that this provision shall extend and apply to the heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators of both parties. Starcher Bros. v. Duty (1907) 61 W. Va. 378, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 913, 123 Am. St. Rep. 990, 56 S. E. 524.

2. The mere fact that a man whose wife was dissatisfied and self-willed succumbed to the inevitable and permitted her to leave his home after reasonable remonstrance and attempt to persuade her not to go does not show that the separation was mutual so as to bar his right to a divorce.

3. That a man assisted his wife with her trunks to the station upon her reaching a determination to leave him does not show that he acquiesced in the desertion so as to bar his securing a divorce.

— desertion — what is.

4. A man is entitled to a divorce on the ground of desertion where his wife left him without any intention of returning after she was honestly asked to remain, and it is evident that she will not return.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marion County dismissing his suit for a divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. C. Winslow, for appellant:

Desertion or abandonment consists in voluntary separation of one spouse from the other for the prescribed time, without the latter's consent, without justification, and with the intention of not returning.

14 Cyc. 611.

Desertion is wilful when it is intentional, and the term does not imply malice or the purpose of doing injury.

Ogilvie v. Ogilvie, 37 Or. 171, 61 Pac. 627.

Mr. Max Gehlhar, for respondent:

If, either expressly or by implication from the circumstances, complainant consents to the original separation or to its continuance and that consent is not revoked, there is no such desertion as warrants a divorce.

Luper v. Luper, 61 Or. 424, 96 Pac. 1099; 14 Cyc. 616.

Findings of fact of the trial judge who heard the witnesses testify should be given great weight on a controverted question of fact.

Hurlburt v. Morris, 68 Or. 259, 135 Pac. 531.

The appellate court cannot determine the preponderance of evidence with the certainty of a court or referee who heard the witnesses testify and noted their manner and appearance on the stand, and findings made under such circumstances will rarely be disturbed where corroborated or supported by other facts and circumstances.

Bruce v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 24 Or. 486, 34 Pac. 16.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court denying plaintiff a divorce. The suit was predicated upon a charge of wilful desertion, and relief was denied by the circuit court upon the theory that the separation of plaintiff from defendant was by mutual consent. The defendant defaulted and the state filed no answer to the complaint. The plaintiff's testimony is undisputed, and the fact that defendant left plaintiff's home and remained away for more than one year, and that she left with the avowed intention of deserting the plaintiff and never resuming marital relations, is fully established. It appears from the testimony that the defendant, a school-teacher by occupation, and a maiden about forty years of age, was married to plaintiff in Australia in 1913 and came immediately with him to this country. From the character of his testimony we infer that he was an ignorant, uncultured man, who earned his living as a laborer and a rancher, and was probably far beneath his wife in educational acquirements. They came to Marion county about 1914, and finally settled on a ranch, where plaintiff pursued the vocation of farming. How he succeeded does not appear, but his neighbors testify that things were apparently fairly comfortable, but evidently not to the satisfaction of the lady, who, in March, 1916, left plaintiff and went to Canada to teach school, with the avowed intention of not returning. According to plaintiff's testimony, her reason for not wishing to live with him was that she did not like country life, but wanted to live in the city and insisted on leaving home to teach school. He testified that about a year before she actually left she proposed to him to get a divorce, to which he gave her no definite answer; but finally she secured a position and announced her intention to leave plaintiff. The circumstances occurring immediately preceding her final departure are detailed by plaintiff, as follows:

Q. What did she say to you about coming back?

A. She said she didn't care how things were going; she didn't intend to come back.

Q. What was your attitude in reference to her going away?

A. Well, I had talked to her and told her that I didn't want her to go, but that I was doing the best I could for her, and if it didn't suit her I couldn't help it. I tried to satisfy her, but couldn't do it. She insisted upon going back to her profession. I told her that the money was going out and nothing coming in, and would have to wait for something to come in.

Q. What did she say about this?

A. Well, she was a woman that had her own way about everything. You couldn't do anything. She was headstrong, indignant.

Q. Did you use every effort you knew how to use to keep her from going?

A. Yes.

Plaintiff testified that he had no arrangement with defendant about a divorce, and that when she asked him in reference to it he told her she could suit herself, that when she left he supposed she would try to get a divorce; that he never told her he would get a divorce; and that there was no arrangement between them on that subject.

He was asked this question by the district attorney:

Q. You didn't object to her going if she wanted to?

A. No, I don't want to put anything in anybody's way if they can do better.

Plaintiff also helped defendant take her baggage to the station when she went away. We do not think the answers made by plaintiff upon cross-examination show that the separation was mutual. It is evident that plaintiff is an ignorant man, who is unable to express himself clearly; but the testimony indicates that he had on his hands a dissatisfied, self-willed wife, who was determined to go away and never return, and that after using reasonable remonstrance, and endeavoring, without avail, to persuade her not to go, he succumbed to the inevitable and allowed her to go without creating a useless scene.

So far as persuasion went, plaintiff did his part, and it was but good manners to help her with her trunks to the station when he found she was determined to go, and this act should not be construed to imply a consent to the separation. The law does not require that a man shall use physical force to detain his wife, or to protest to the iron heavens against her going, in order that the separation shall not be deemed collusive. It seems reasonably certain that no persuasion or objection on plaintiff's part would have prevented her going, and that he never consented to it, but, on the contrary, remonstrated against it. We think defendant's conduct falls fairly within the definition of desertion given by Mr. Commissioner Slater in Luper v. Luper, 61 Or. 418, 96 Pac. 1099: "Desertion or abandonment consists in the voluntary separation of one spouse from the other for the prescribed time, without the latter's consent, without justification, and with the intention of not returning."

The defendant went after she was honestly asked to remain; she went without the intention of returning, and it is evident she will not return. Under these circumstances, plaintiff ought not to be hampered in the transaction of his business or the transfer of his real

ANNOTATION.

Desertion as affected by element of remonstrance or resistance.

The general rule is well established that the consent by one spouse to the departure of the other will prevent the obtaining of a divorce for desertion. This note deals with the necessity and extent of the remonstrance or resistance which will negative the consent to the separation. The question obviously depends upon the particular facts and circumstances of each case.

It will be observed that in the reported case (NUNN v. NUNN, ante, 500) there was held to be a desertion by the wife, which was not consented to by the husband, where it appeared that she became dissatisfied living on a farm and determined to go away and never return; that her husband told her he did not want her to go and attempted to persuade her to stay, but when he found she was determined to go he helped her to the station with her trunks.

As intimated by the court in this case, the spouse is not required to resort to physical force to prevent the other spouse's departure.

In a somewhat similar case, Northway v. Northway (1898) 116 Mich. 19, 74 N. W. 211, the evidence was held to justify a finding that the wife's separation was against her husband's will, where he testified that he never consented to her moving, and that she took her things away against his will, although on cross-examination he testified that he did not object to her taking her things and going, and did not forbid the man who moved her furniture doing so, but added in explanation that he knew that it would do no good for him to object.

And in Hope v. Hope (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 178 S. W. 32, the evidence was held to show a voluntary abandonment by the wife not agreed to by the husband, but merely acquiesced in by him, where he testified that his wife asked him to take her to her father's for a visit, and on the way over told him that she was not going to live with him any more, that he asked her to continue to live with him, and left her with the understanding that she would write him to come for her at a certain time if she decided to return and live with him; but that she never wrote.

And the testimony in Craig v. Craig (1909) 90 Ark. 40, 117 S. W. 765, was held to show that the wife left against her husband's will, and that her desertion was intentional and wilful, where there was testimony that the parties quarreled and that she left and returned to her father's where she remained, and refused to return to her husband, and that at the time she was preparing to leave her husband told his son to go in and try to persuade her to stay, and that he did so, but that she refused.

And in Kaster v. Kaster (1890) 43 Mo. App. 115, the evidence was held to show a desertion by the wife without the husband's consent where there was testimony that she took all of her household effects, left her husband's home, and went to keep house for her children by another marriage; that the husband objected to her departure, and told her he would consider her separation as a ground for divorce.

And in Stoffer v. Stoffer (1883) 50 Mich. 491, 15 N. W. 564, there was held to be a desertion by the wife, where it appeared that she avowed her purpose to separate from her husband and not live with him again; that he was opposed to the separation and endeavored through a friend to prevent it, but without success, and that on her demand he gave her a sum of money when she left, in return for which she released her claims on his property.

And there was held to have been a desertion by the wife in Ashburn v. Ashburn (1903) 101 Mo. App. 365, 74 S. W. 394, where the husband warned her that if she accepted employment away from home in defiance of his wishes, as she proposed, she could not return, and she subsequently left and continued away for the statutory period authorizing a divorce.

And there was held to be an obstinate desertion against the husband's consent in Bridge v. Bridge (1915) — N. J. Eq. —, 93 Atl. 690, where, although he had several times told his wife to go, when she got ready to go he asked her not to go, and begged her to stay, and made efforts subsequently to see her, but she refused to see him and ignored his letters.

And in Schanck v. Schanck (1881) 33 N. J. Eq. 363, there was held to be a desertion by the husband where, although the wife told him that he could go his way and she would go hers, she immediately repented and asked him to come back, but he refused and went and never afterwards communicated with her.

And in Fisher v. Fisher (1907) 81 W. Va. 105, 93 S. E. 1041, the wife was held entitled to a divorce for the desertion of her husband where the evidence showed that against her continued protest he left her home where he had by an antenuptial agreement agreed to live, and, without a request that his wife reside with him, returned to his home and lived with his children by a former marriage.

But in Reed v. Reed (1896) 62 Ark. 611, 37 S. W. 230, it was held that the husband consented to the separation and that the wife did not wilfully desert him where, after a difference had arisen between them because of the wife's children, and when she told the husband that she was going to her home, he told her that he had the same team that brought her, and that it could take her back, and with his consent it was used to take her back, and he afterwards visited her regularly and the parties assisted each other.

And in Herold v. Herold (1890) 47 N. J. Eq. 210, 9 L.R.A. 696, 20 Atl. 375, a husband was held not entitled to a divorce on the ground of desertion where it appeared that the only steps taken by him to show that her leaving was against his wish was to call in a neighbor who had been in the habit of lending the wife money, and state that his wife wanted to leave him, that that was her home and where she belonged, and that if she went away he would not be responsible for anything.

And there was no desertion or breaking off of the marriage relation against the husband's will where, although he learned from neighbors of his wife's intention of going to a distant state to visit her daughter, he said nothing to her, and after she had gone did not correspond with her, or make any effort to have her return. Wright v. Wright (1890) 80 Mich. 572, 45 N. W. 365.

And the wife's desertion was held not obstinate in Van Wart v. Van Wart (1898) 57 N. J. Eq. 598, 41 Atl. 965, where it appeared, among other things, that on the day of her departure her husband stood by without asking her to stay and made no effort to have her return.

And where a husband knows that his wife intends going to another state to engage in business and he makes no effort whatever to have her remain with him, and offers no inducements for her return, but on the other hand appears to rejoice that she has gone, the desertion, if any, was not against his will, and he is not entitled to a divorce. Beller v. Beller (1883) 50 Mich. 49, 14 N. W. 696.

In Neagley v. Neagley (1915) 59 Pa. Super. Ct. 565, where the husband advised the wife not to go West, and stated that if she was bound to go he would not go with her, the evidence was held to justify a finding that she went without his consent, but that it did not show clearly that she left against his wish, and, she subsequently having made an offer to live with him before the expiration of the two-year period, which he rejected, there was held to be no wilful desertion.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

v.
SAME.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court — January 4, 1910.

(262 Pa. 474, 105 Atl. 824.)

Railroad — duty to extinguish fire.

1. A railroad company whose engine, without negligence on its part, sets fire to property adjoining its right of way, is not liable for destruction of timber on nonadjoining property to which the fire spread because the crew of the train which started the fire refused to assist in extinguishing it.

[See note on this question beginning on page 509.]

— liability for setting out fire.

2. A railroad company is not liable for fire set to adjoining property by sparks from its engine if it takes the necessary precautions and employs the proper mechanism to prevent the escape of sparks from its engines and the mechanism is in proper condition.

[See 11 R. C. L. 965.]

Damages — eminent domain — liability to fire.

3. The liability of remaining property to fire is a proper element of damages to be awarded for the taking of land for a railroad right of way.

[See 10 R. C. L. 153-156.]

Master and servant — scope of duty — extinguishment of fire.

4. The extinguishment of fires which may start on land adjoining a railroad right of way is not within the scope of duty of members of train crews.

[See 11 R. C. L. 962-963.]

— liability of employer.

5. An employer is not liable for any act or omission of an employee that is not within the scope of his employment.

[See 18 R. C. L. 793 et seq.]

APPEAL by plaintiffs from judgments of the Court of Common Pleas for Jefferson County in favor of defendant, notwithstanding verdicts for plaintiffs in actions brought to recover damages for destruction of timber by fire. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. T. Darr, A. M. Liveright, and Miller & Hartswick, for appellants:

The railroad company is answerable in damages, and there need be no showing that it negligently originated the fire. It is sufficient to show that it was the moving cause of the fire, whether in the ordinary course of its operations or otherwise, and that it negligently failed to take those steps or precautions towards extinguishing the fire that ordinary prudence would dictate.

Messrs. Don C. Corbett and Raymond E. Brown for appellee.

Fox, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in these cases were the owners of timberland in Gaskill township, Jefferson county. Their land was not immediately adjacent to the right of way of the defendant company, but there were lands of other owners intervening; the land nearest the railroad being that of the Madeira Hill Coal Company at Clover Run. The Madeira Company operated a mine on its property, which was in Clearfield county a short distance east of the Jefferson county line. The Madeira Company had cut the timber on its land, and there were at various points near the right of way of the defendant company an accumulation of tops, limbs, and other débris left upon the ground. It was in this combustible matter on the land of the Madeira Hill Coal Company that the fire which occasioned the injury in this case started.

The Hillman branch of the Bellwood division of the Pennsylvania Railroad was built to reach the operation of the Madeira Hill Coal Company. On the day of the fire a train consisting of two engines, six empty cars, and a passenger coach passed over this branch. The head engine went into a siding before reaching the tipple of the coal company, while the other engine pushed the six empty cars out on the tipple. Both engines were in good working order and were equipped with spark arresters. About fifteen or twenty minutes after the engines passed the tipple, a fire was observed in the rubbish on the land of the Madeira Coal Company at a distance of about 70

Four employees of the coal company, shortly after the fire started, went to the point where it had started and endeavored to extinguish it, but without success, owing to the dryness of the tops, limbs, and other lumber, and the fact that a strong wind was blowing at the time. The train was running on a schedule, and shortly after the fire broke out (the witnesses differing as to the time which elapsed) the train left in order to make a connection with the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The crews of the two engines consisted of four men each, and after the fire broke out the attention of a member of the crew, not identified by name, was directed to the fact that fire had started, and he was requested to call the crew and ask them to assist in extinguishing the fire. This he declined to do, on the ground that it was outside the line of his duty and that he was required to give attention to the operation of the train. It is also alleged that the other members of the crew saw the fire raging, but did nothing to assist in extinguishing it. After the train crew left they sent word to a section gang of the fact that the fire was burning, and in response to this the section gang came and joined the others in attempting to fight the fire. This attempt was unsuccessful, and the fire quickly spread to adjoining lands, and ultimately reached the land of the plaintiffs where a large amount of valuable timber was destroyed. This suit was brought to recover damages for this injury.

The case was submitted to the jury on the theory that the defendant company had been negligent in the operation of its engine and trains in permitting cinders to escape from the locomotive, and also that it was negligent in failing to extinguish the fire after it had started. After the jury had retired counsel for the plaintiffs requested the court to recall the jury and instruct them that the claim of the plaintiffs was based entirely upon the ground that the railroad company had been guilty of neglect by reason of the failure of the crew to put out the fire or to make any effort to put it out after it had been started. The learned judge of the court below refused to take this course, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, in the one case for $4,128, and in the other for $3,732. This verdict was based generally on the ground that the railroad company was guilty of negligence. There was no proof which would justify a finding of negligence on the part of the railroad company because of its failure to equip the engine with a spark arrester, and the sole question presented for our determination is: Was the company negligent by reason of the failure of the train crew to abandon the train for the time being and devote its energies to the extinguishment of the fire?

The fire did not start on the right of way of the defendant company. The accumulation of debris was on the land of the coal company, and hence no negligence can be imputed to the defendant company in this regard. The learned counsel for the appellant in their printed argument based the right of the plaintiffs to recover upon these facts: That the men employed by the coal company told one of the train crew that the fire had started and could be readily extinguished; that there were eight men in the employ of the company in these two crews; that six of them could have been released for work about the fire; that after completing their railroad work the crews lay for a time in the yard while the fire was in progress and made no effort to extinguish it; that water was available both in the tender and boiler of the engines and at a water tank about 300 feet away near the railroad track; that the coal company had a company store within easy walking distance where they had pails and buckets for sale; and that it was the duty of the train crew to go to this store and procure buckets and go to the engines or the tank and procure the water necessary to put out the fire. Was any such duty imposed upon the railroad company? Can it be held as a matter of law that it is the duty of the train crew in the employ of a railroad company to stop the work in which they are ordinarily engaged at any point along the line of the railway where they observe a fire on adjoining land, and take such measures as are possible to extinguish that fire? This proposition, if sound, must be applied not only in cases of timberland and in rural communities and farming districts, but in populous cities as well. If it is to be the rule on a branch line and where trains are infrequent and slow, it must also govern on the main line of a railroad such as that of the defendant company, with fast express trains and constant traffic. Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts, has defined negligence as "the failure to observe for the protection of the interests of another person that degree of care, precaution and vigilance which the circumstances justly demand, whereby such other person suffers injury." [3d ed. * 752.] The test to be applied, therefore, is: Was there any obligation on the part of the railroad company under the circumstances to exercise any care or vigilance such as is complained of in the statement filed by the plaintiffs and now urged on this appeal?

We have repeatedly held that, where the railroad company takes the necessary precautions and employs a proper mechanism to prevent the escape of sparks from their engines, there can be no recovery of damages for any injury which results simply from the throwing of sparks, provided the mechanism is in proper condition. It is also true that one of the elements of damage taken into consideration by a jury when land is appropriated under the exercise of eminent domain by a railroad company is the possibility of fires which may occur without negligence on the part of the railroad company. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Yeiser, 8 Pa. 366.

If, therefore, the mere existence of a fire on land adjoining the right of way of a railroad company imposes no liability on the company unless there be proof of negligence, a fortiori no liability arises when the property destroyed is on land which is not adjacent to the right of way, but is separated therefrom by the land of several intervening owners, unless there be proof of actual negligence. If the fire is ignited by reason of the negligence of the railroad company, a different situation would arise, but where it is conceded, as here, that the fire was not started by the negligent act of the company, it did not owe the duty of care, protection, and vigilance to the plaintiff to the degree that it is liable in damages under the particular circumstances proved in this case. It is damnum absque injuria.

The cases cited in the brief of counsel for the appellant do not sustain their view that the failure of the train crew to respond to the appeal for aid in extinguishing the fire constituted negligence on the part of the company. In both McCully v. Clarke, 40 Pa. 399, 80 Am. Dec. 584, and Baylor v. Stevens, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 365, the fire started on the land of the defendant company, and there was evidence from which a jury could find negligence because of the conditions existing on the property of the defendant. These are the only Pennsylvania decisions cited. The cases cited from other jurisdictions are all readily distinguished by their facts from the case at bar. In most of them the railroad company negligently permitted an accumulation of grass, weeds, or brush upon the right of way, and the fire which occasioned the injury was ignited in this way. Sparks were negligently thrown from the engines of the defendant company because of defective mechanism, thus affording evidence of
